In short, advertising columns and pecuniary reward muzzle the news columns and distort and color the facts which they contain, thus destroying their accuracy and utility and leading to antisocial presentations. When any argument is made for the control of newspaper presentations, however, it is met by the time-honored appeal to freedom of discussion. But, as an answer to this appeal, it should be remembered (1) that, as a matter of fact, the public does not get freedom of discussion in the newspaper. It gets discussion which is strictly censored in the ways mentioned above, in large part by special interests and the desire for gains at the cost of the public; and (2), that as a principle freedom of discussion is useful and desirable only when it secures advantageous social results. Freedom of discussion apart from its results is not in itself a worthy end.

(3) Endowed and public-owned newspapers have been proposed as remedies for the present evils springing from a system of private-owned newspapers. While public-owned newspapers might secure the kind of news which is desirable—at least in some respects—they are such a far-off contingency that it is more practical to consider proposals which can be put into operation more quickly. The endowed newspaper, as an adequate solution of the problem, is at present as impracticable as the public-owned newspaper. It would moreover be but a partial relief so long as private-owned newspapers were in the field.

(4) Therefore, it is important to consider methods possible at present.

(a) We need new and adequately enforced laws defining strictly the power of newspapers to deal with news, laws analogous to those already in operation in regard to the use of the mails, billboards, etc. Such laws would, as a matter of fact, in many cases be mere formulations of practices already in vogue. Courts, both in the United States and England, have already shown their power to restrain newspapers from, or to punish them for, detailing certain types of antisocial facts.

(b) Judges should recognize in their decisions the facts already known regarding antisocial suggestion.

(c) Public opinion needs to be educated to secure support for constructive legislation along this line and to support such laws as we have or as may be made.

(d) Further investigation of the relation of newspaper suggestion and other suggestion to crime and other antisocial activity should be made, and public officials, such as probation officers, juvenile court judges and other judges, superintendents of institutions, etc., should be encouraged and required to keep records of cases of such connection. In this way a better basis for activity regarding the newspapers could be established.

Another interesting paper on the subject, showing especially the extent to which the space given in the leading and standard newspapers to scandals, crimes, and the like, will be found in an article by John Gilmer Speed, in volume 15 of the Forum, entitled "Do the newspapers give the news?"

In the course of the article the author says:

Suppose we examine representative New York newspapers of 12 years ago and compare them with the same papers of this year. For example, we will take the Sun, the World, Times, and Tribune of Sunday, April 17, 1881, and compare them with the same papers of Sunday, April 16, 1893. I wish to remark here that I selected this date in April merely by chance and not because I was aware of anything in the papers of that day making them at all extraordinary. Indeed, it may be that they were more commonplace than usual, for it happened that the day before there were no "carnivals of crime" or "bloody butcheries" anywhere within telegraphic reach. The Sunday Sun and World of the date given in 1881 were each 8-page, 7-column papers. The Tribune had 12 pages of 6 columns each, and the Times 16 pages of 7 columns each. Men remarked 12 years ago that these were very large papers; but on the corresponding Sunday of 1893 the Tribune was just twice as large, having 24 pages of 6 columns each; the Times had 20 pages with 7 columns each; the Sun had 28 pages of 7 columns each; and the World 44 pages of 8 columns each. This was expansion in earnest. But if the quality of the reading matter had not suffered by this expansion, and if it were not bad before the expansion began, then probably no one has the right to complain.

For the purpose of comparing the various kinds of subjects treated in the papers of the different dates I have made the following table:

Columns of reading matter in New York newspapers, Apr. 17, 1881, and Apr. 16, 1893.

Subject.	Tribune, 1881.	Tribune, 1893.	World, 1881.	World, 1893.	Times, 1881.	Times, 1893.	Sun, 1881.	Sun, 1893.
Editorial	700	700	475	400	600	500	400	400
Religious	200	.....	75	.....	100	.....	50	100
Scientific	100	75	.....	200	100	.....	.....	250
Political	300	375	.....	1,050	100	400	100	350
Literary	1,700	500	100	200	1,800	1,200	575	600

Crimes and criminals	.....	50	.....	600	.....	100	.....	.....
Art	100	100	300	300	200	.....	25	125

The true significance of this table, of course, lies in the percentage relation of the different subjects to the total number of columns printed. Thus while the Times on this particular Sunday in 1881 contained 18 columns of literary matter, or 16 per cent of the total space in the whole paper, the literary matter in the corresponding Sunday of this year is 12 columns, or only 9.6 per cent of the total space. The "gossip" in the Times in 12 years increased from four-tenths of 1 per cent of the total space to eleven and seven-tenths of 1 per cent of the space—that is, from one-half a column it had grown during the 12 years to 16½ columns. The religious matter had dropped from one column in 1881 to nothing in 1893. Scientific matters decreased exactly in the same way; while the scandals, which filled only one column in 1881, now needed two columns and a half to hold them. The sporting news grew from 3 to 10 columns; art criticism dropped from 2 columns to nothing.

In the Sun of 1881, on the particular Sunday alluded to, there were no scandals printed; on the corresponding Sunday of 1893 the scandals filled 2 columns of the paper, or about 1 per cent of the total space, and the gossip increased from 2 to 13 columns. The literary matter in the Sun remained about the same, while more space was given to religious, scientific, and art subjects.

The Tribune in 1881 has 2 columns of religious matter and not a line in 1893. The scandals, however, which were nothing in 1881, had increased to a column and a half, while the gossip had grown from 1 column to 23, and so filled more than 16 per cent of the space of the paper. Sporting, too, grew from 1 column to 6½ columns, while in both years editorial comments and art criticism remained the same.

The World in 1881 had no scandals and only a column of gossip. In 1893 the scandals filled a column and a half and the gossip 6¾ columns. The music and drama in the former year required a column and a half, while 11 columns were used in 1893. It is likely that fully 8 of these 11 columns devoted to music and the drama should be credited to gossip. In 1881 the World had no stories of crimes and criminals; in the paper of April 16, 1893, 6 columns were devoted to these subjects.

In an article by Charles Emory Smith, one of the noted newspaper men of the country, in the Independent, defending the newspapers and condemning a libel law passed by the Legislature of Pennsylvania, he has this to say of the objectionable features of present-day journalism:

Freedom of the press undoubtedly degenerates at times into license. We have seen invasions of the sanctity of private life which are wholly deplorable and unjustifiable. We have seen newspapers intrude into the sacred realm of purely domestic concerns and drag out that which should remain behind the veil for sensational effect or the salacious delectation of an eager public. In the fretful race of competition there has probably been too much disposition to regard everything which Argus eyes can detect as the legitimate subject of the remorseless news gatherer. The public are quite as much at fault as the newspapers. This tendency to seize upon personal affairs and to exploit them in picturesque style ministers to a popular taste which is as old as mankind. There ought doubtless to be some reform of newspaper ethics, and the surest path to it would be an anterior reform of human nature itself.

This quotation reveals the excuse for the newspapers that the people want that kind of sensational news. I am coming to that a little further along.

Another excuse, as it relates to the publication of particulars of crimes, is that it is an aid to the detection and conviction of the criminals. That, also, I will come to later.

There are a few, fortunately a very few, who justify the publication of obscene literature, not because it is demanded by the people, but upon the broad ground that it is a right that should not be abridged and is actually beneficial. A book entitled "Obscene Literature and Constitutional Law" is a conspicuous and unworthy example of this kind. It is written by Theodore Schroeder, who gives himself the title of "Legal counselor to the Medico-Legal Society of New York." As the purveyor of obscene and poisonous literature it is one of the worst of its kind. It gives the substance of many of the worst and most obscene books that have been excluded from the mails under the law I have mentioned. I wonder how this book escaped the vigilance of the Post Office Department. In the estimation of the writer of it nothing can be too vile and indecent to publish, if only it claims to be educational, especially if it emanates from the Medico-Legal Society, of which he is counselor. A very fair estimate of the book and the perverted mind of its author may be reached by reading the following passage in the preface:

My numerous smug friends, who pride themselves on their "eminent respectability," often reproach me gently for my extensive advocacy of freedom of speech and press, and of uncensored mails and express. To defend the right of all humans to an opportunity to know all there is to know, even about the subject of sex, to the polluted minds of my "pure" friends, is to defend an "uncleanness"—not at all unclean so far as it relates to their own bodies, but "unclean" to talk and read about—not "unclean" as to any acts or facts in their own lives, but "unclean" only to admit a consciousness of those facts. I reluctantly confess that all such hypocritical moral cant or diseased sex sensitiveness arouses in me the most profound contempt of which my phlegmatic nature is capable. Perhaps that is one reason why I was impelled to do this uncompensated and unpopular work, and sometimes to do it in a manner that is devoid of tact, according to the judgment of those who dare not countenance robust frankness.

Among other things the author maintains that the constitutionality of the act of Congress, or other similar State statutes, against sending obscene matter through the mails has never been passed upon by the courts, although hundreds of convictions have been affirmed. He takes this broad ground:

The postal laws against "obscene" literature are void under the constitutional prohibition against the abridgment of freedom of speech and of the press. Likewise all similar State legislation is void under State constitutions.

Of course, the prohibition against sending obscene matter through the mails is not a direct provision against the publication of such matter. But it is an abridgment of the freedom of publication by depriving the publisher of the use of the mails as a means of such publication, a right granted to others, and denied to him only because of the objectionable nature of the matter offered by him.

So, Mr. President, the principle involved is precisely the same, whether we forbid the use of the mails to distribute such matter to the public or impose a penalty for the printing and publication of it. In either case, if the freedom of the press gives the constitutional right to publish the poisonous criminally suggestive and deleterious matter that I am condemning, then both the law now on the statute book denying the use of the mails for such publications and the one proposed by me are an abridgment of that right and void as a violation of the Constitution.

It must be obvious that I can not take up the time of the Senate in any lengthy discussion of this constitutional question, important as I conceive it to be, or with a critical review of the cases bearing upon it. But any discussion of it without reference to some of the leading cases would be incomplete and unsatisfactory. So I hope the Senate will bear with me while I consider a very few of the many decisions of the courts dealing with the question.

In United States v. Harrison (45 Fed. Rep., 414) Phillips, judge, has this to say:

THE CONSTITUTIONALITY OF THE ACT OF CONGRESS.

It is next objected that the act of Congress under which this indictment was founded is in contravention of the first amendment of the Federal Constitution, which declares that "Congress shall make no law * * * abridging the freedom of speech or of the press." Counsel has urged this objection with such force and vigor of reasoning as to entitle it to serious consideration under other conditions than those which exist. The constitutionality of the act in question has been affirmed by the court of last resort in the case of Ex parte Jackson (96 U. S., 727). It is true the direct question there presented was as to that branch of the statute denying the use of the mails to lottery circulars, etc., but the opinion of the court proceeds on the theory that the provision of the statute respecting lotteries is so closely allied to that declaring obscene literature nonmailable matter that it must rest upon the same principle, and thereupon proceeds to discuss the latter feature of the statute and to uphold its constitutionality. Until overruled this decision must control the action of this court. In view, however, of the fact that the defendant places so much stress along the line of his entire defense on the liberty which should be accorded to the press, it may as well be said here as elsewhere that it is a radical misconception of the scope of the constitutional protection to indulge the belief that a person may print and publish ad libitum any matter, whatever the substance or language, without accountability to law. Liberty in all its forms and assertions in this country is regulated by law. It is not an unbridled license. Where vituperation or licentiousness begins the liberty of the press ends. While the genius of our institutions of government accords the largest liberality in the utterance of private opinion and the widest latitude in polemics, touching questions of social ethics, political and domestic economy, and the like, it must ever be kept in mind that this invaluable privilege is not paramount to the golden rule of every civilized society, sic utere tuo ut non alienum laedas—"so exercise your own freedom as not to infringe the rights of others or the public peace and safety." (2 Story Const., sec. 1888.) While, happily, we have outlived the epoch of censors and licensors of the press, to whom the publisher must submit his matter in advance, responsibility yet attaches to him when he transcends the boundary line where he outrages the common sense of decency or endangers the public safety. As said by that eminent jurist, Judge Story (Id., secs. 1884–1887):

"There is a good deal of loose reasoning on the subject of the liberty of the press, as if its inviolability were constitutionally such that, like the King of England, it could do no wrong and was free from every inquiry and afforded a perfect sanctuary for every abuse; that, in short, it implied a despotic sovereignty to do every sort of wrong without the slightest accountability to private or public justice. Such a notion is too extravagant to be held by any sound constitutional lawyer with regard to the rights and duties belonging to governments generally or to the State governments in particular. If it were admitted to be correct, it might be justly affirmed that the liberty of the press was incompatible with the permanent existence of any free government * * * In short, is it contended that the liberty of the press is so much more valuable than all other rights in society that the public safety—nay, the existence of the Government itself—is to yield to it? It would be difficult to answer these questions in favor of the liberty of the press without at the same time declaring that such a license belonged and could belong only to a despotism and was utterly incompatible with the principles of a free government."

This is an admirable and concise statement of the law on the subject. Other interesting cases bearing on the question are the following:

United States v. Bennett (16 Blatch., U. S. C. C., 338); State v. Van Wye (136 Mo., 272); In re Banks (56 Kans., 242); State v. Sykes (28 Conn., 224); State v. Faulds (17 Mont., 140); State v. Shepherd (177 Mo., 205); Riley v. Lee (88 Ky., 603); Pavesich v. New England Life Insurance Co. (122 Ga., 190); State v. McKee (73 Conn., 18; 49 Law Rep. An., 542).

The question is discussed and the correct rule laid down in State v. Van Wye (136 Mo., 227), in which the court said:

The constitutionality of the act of 1891 already quoted is assailed because it is claimed to be in contravention of section 14 of the bill of rights of Missouri. That familiar section ordains that "No law shall be passed impairing the freedom of speech; that every person shall be free to say, write, or publish whatever he will on any subject, being responsible for all abuse of that liberty; and that in all suits and prosecutions for libel the truth thereof may be given in evidence."

* * * * * * *

"The liberty of the press," says Lord Mansfield, in King v. Dean of St. Asaph (cited in note to 3 T. R., 431), "consists in printing without any previous license, subject to the consequence of the law." Lord Ellenborough defines it in Rex v. Cobbett (29 Howell's State Trials, 49), in this way: "The law of England is a law of liberty, and, consistently with this liberty, we have not what is called an imprimatur; there is no such preliminary license necessary. But if a man publish a paper, he is exposed to the penal consequences, as he is in every other act, if it be illegal."

Thus understood the provision in our bill of rights was adopted substantially in the constitutions of several States of our American Union and in the Federal Constitution. Says Judge Cooley: "It must be evident from these historical facts that liberty of the press, as now understood and enjoyed, is of very recent origin; and commentators seem to be agreed in the opinion that the term itself means only that liberty of publication without the previous permission of the Government, which was obtained by the abolition of the censorship." (Cooley on Constitutional Limitations (6 Ed.), p. 516; Hallam's Const. History of England, ch. 15; De Lolme's Const. of England, 254; 4 Blackstone's Com., 151; Story on Const., sec. 1889; 2 Kent., 17, et seq.; Rawle, Constitution, ch. 10.)

The constitutional liberty of speech and of the press, as we understand it, simply guarantees the right to freely utter and publish whatever the citizens may desire and to be protected in so doing, provided always that such publications are not blasphemous, obscene, and scandalous in their character so that they become an offense against the public, and by their malice and falsehood injuriously affect the character, reputation, or pecuniary interests of individuals. The constitutional protection shields no one from responsibility for abuse of this right. To hold that it did would be a cruel libel upon the bill of rights itself. The laws punishing criminal libel have never been deemed an infringement of this constitutional guaranty. Equally numerous and strong are the decisions that obscene publications are without the protection of this provision of our constitution.

Another concise statement of the law on the subject may be found in In re Banks (56 Kans., 242), as follows:

It is contended that said chapter 161 is void, because in contravention of section 11 of the bill of rights, which reads:

"The liberty of the press shall be inviolate; and all persons may freely speak, write, or publish their sentiments on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of such right; and in all civil or criminal actions for libel the truth may be given in evidence to the jury, and if it shall appear that the alleged libelous matter was published for justifiable ends the accused party shall be acquitted."

The act under consideration was not passed to prevent the publication of libels nor to suppress papers indulging in such publications, but to prevent the publication and sale of newspapers especially devoted to the publication of scandals and accounts of lecherous and immoral conduct. Without doubt, a newspaper the most prominent feature of which is items detailing the immoral conduct of individuals, spreading out to public view an unsavory mass of corruption and moral degradation, is calculated to taint the social atmosphere, and by describing in detail the means resorted to by immoral persons to gratify their propensities tends especially to corrupt the morals of the young, and lead them into vicious paths and immoral acts. We entertain no doubt that the legislature has power to suppress this class of publications without in any manner violating the constitutional liberties of the press.

What is meant by "liberty of the press" and the extent to which the lawmaking power may go in preventing objectionable matter from being published are very well stated in the opinion of the court in State v. McKee (73 Conn., 18), in the following language:

The primary meaning of "liberty of the press," as understood at the time our early constitutions were framed, was freedom from any censorship of the press; from "all such previous restraints upon publications as had been practiced by other Governments and in early times here to stifle the efforts of patriots toward enlightening their fellow subjects upon their rights and the duties of rulers." (Commonwealth v. Blanding, 3 Pick., 304, 313.) But this fundamental guaranty goes further; it recognizes the free expression of opinion on matters of church or state as essential to the successful operation of free government, and it also recognizes the free expression of opinion on any subject as essential to a condition of civil liberty. The right to discuss public matters stands in part on the necessity of that right to the operation of a government by the people; but, with this exception, the right of every citizen to freely express his sentiments on all subjects stands on the broad principle which supports the equal right of all to exercise gifts of property and faculty in any pursuit in life—in other words, upon the essential principles of civil liberty as recognized by our Constitution. Every citizen has an equal right to use his mental endowments as well as his property in any harmless occupation or manner, but he has no right to use them so as to injure his fellow citizens or to endanger the vital interests of society. Immunity in the mischievous use is as inconsistent with civil liberty as prohibition of the harmless use. Both arise from the equal right of all to protection of law in the enjoyment of individual freedom of action, which is the ultimate fundamental principle. This truth is plainly expressed in the language of section 3 and of section 5. The liberty protected is not the right to perpetrate acts of licentiousness or any act inconsistent with the peace or safety of the State. Freedom of speech and press does not include the abuse of the power of tongue or pen any more than freedom of other action includes an injurious use of one's occupation, business, or property.

* * * * * * *

The notion that the broad guaranty of the common right to free speech and free thought contained in our Constitution is intended to erect a bulwark or supply a place of refuge in behalf of the violators of laws enacted for the protection of society from the contagion of moral diseases belittles the conception of the constitutional safeguards and implies ignorance of the essentials of civil liberty.

Mr. President, no discussion of this question would be complete without some reference to the kodak and the cartoon. They have become a part—and a very important part—of the facilities of the modern newspaper in its effort to instruct, inform, and please the reading public.

They have their valuable uses and are not to be condemned or despised except for their excesses and abuses. The kodak often furnishes in picture form a much clearer understanding of conditions than can be done by written description. The cartoon has been a powerful instrument in exposing wrongdoing by bringing the wrongdoer to the attention of the public and holding him there. Besides, both of these newspaper adjuncts furnish harmless entertainment and pleasure to many newspaper readers.

But, Mr. President, no part of the work of a newspaper can be or has been more grossly unfair, obtrusive, and objectionable in many ways than the operation of the kodak and cartoon. The newspaper reporter forces himself into the privacy of the home and the affairs of men and mercilessly exposes them to the world without reason, in violation of the right of privacy on the part of the citizen and often in opposition to the plainest rules of decency and common respect for the feelings of others. The kodak man follows in the wake of the reporter and, in open violation of the same rules, snaps the pictures of the persons, homes, and places of business of all persons connected with the particular matter that is to be worked up into a sensational story for public reading. Then comes the cartoonist with distorted pictures intended to ridicule, humiliate, and disgrace the individual that the newspaper has undertaken to dissect. It is a combination that has more of inhuman brutality about it than almost any other power of the present day. It has brought discord, unhappiness, and ruin to many households, driven thousands of innocent people to despair, sometimes to death by their own hands, led many to crime, others to disgrace and sorrow, degraded the minds of the millions of newspaper readers, lowered the standard of citizenship, convicted hundreds of innocent men and women of crimes of which they were not guilty, and stultified and disgraced the newspapers that have indulged in such practices.

But, Mr. President, this is not to say that the newspaper or the kodak or the cartoon should be suppressed. I have only been pointing out their abuses, all of which should be corrected to make them useful and valuable instruments in the hands of men for the education, instruction, and edification of their fellow men. It is the wrongful use of all of these that I complain of. The caricatures of men in public and private life for malicious, selfish, or other ulterior purposes so frequently resorted to by the newspapers through the cartoonists are inexcusable and a disgrace to the papers and their publishers. It is beneath the dignity and in violation of the obligations of the true journalist. The unblushing effrontery of some of the kodak men in intruding themselves into the privacy of others and in displaying to the world the most sacred things is sometimes shocking, even revolting, in the extreme.

Within a very short time, I, in company with other Members of this body, was in attendance at the funeral of a distinguished officer of the Government, and a man who was held in the highest esteem by all who knew him and in peculiarly sincere and warm affection by his relatives and friends. It was an occasion of great solemnity and an exhibition of unusual respect and affection for the distinguished dead. It was marred by the persistent and unseemly efforts of a number of kodak men to secure pictures of what was being done and of the people present. As the body was removed from the church, followed by the mourning family and others, these men were swarming like ghouls, snapping pictures here and there, some of them perched on the steps and other higher projections of the church, wherever they could gain a footing, plying their trade over the heads of the crowds of people who were there to do honor to the memory of their friend and fellow citizen. To me it was a shocking and humiliating spectacle that I shall not soon forget. This, Mr. President, is one of the striking cases of the abuse of this very proper means of supplying information to the public. Unfortunately, it is only one of many that have gone far to discredit this legitimate calling and give the men engaged in it the unenviable title of "kodak fiends."

The abuses on the part of the cartoonists are much the same. To my mind, one of their worst offenses is the treatment of the President of the United States. Whoever he may be, and whatever his personality, the office itself should be respected and protect its occupant from such caricatures of him as are altogether too common. I often wonder what other countries must think of a people who will allow their Chief Magistrate to be subjected to such treatment.

Mr. President, there is another agency for the distribution of news that should not be overlooked in the consideration of this question. The Associated Press sends out broadcast over the whole country such news as should never see the light of day. Indeed, it seems to select such items as are most sensational and least important or useful. If a Member of this body addresses the Senate and discusses serious and important questions that the country should know about, but in connection with it attacks or criticizes anyone else, or says anything that is regarded as sensational, it is the latter and not the former that is selected and telegraphed out. This gatherer and distributor of the news rarely misses anything of the sensational kind in its work. Its accounts of crimes, suicides, accidents, divorce proceedings, and other matters of no importance and which should never be published, crowd the telegraph wires to the exclusion of legitimate and useful news.

Doubtless the excuse for this is that it is that kind of news that its newspaper patrons want and therefore it must be furnished. In turn the newspaper publishers justify themselves by saying it is the kind of news that their readers want. Perhaps the newspaper side of it can be better stated by the New York World, one of the great metropolitan journals of the country. On the 27th day of December, 1912, that paper carried this editorial:

Our sober-minded contemporary, the Wall Street Journal, is distressed at the World's misguided methods of presenting to its readers the news of the day:

"It is apparent, even to a casual reader, that the aim of the World—and the case of other journals is not far removed—is to present the 'news' to its readers in a highly sensational aspect. Take, for example, and just as a chance selection, the headlines of December 13, flaring, wild, extravagant. We are told in large capital letters that the 'Police are scared by woman's exposé of graft on vice'; that 'Luring husband away, wife tries to kill woman'; that 'Stock Exchange winks at all manipulations'; that 'Daughter is in a plot, her father says,' and so on ad nauseam. All of which may be true, but where is the tremendous import of it all?'

The World brazenly admits the soft impeachment and rises to explain its misconduct. "The tremendous import of it all" is that the vast majority of perfectly wholesome and normally intelligent men and women are a great deal more interested in the flesh-and-blood doings, springing from flesh-and-blood motives of flesh-and-blood human beings than they are in theories of economics, problems of governments, perplexities of diplomacy, or complexities of banking and currency.

No sane man doubts that the latter class of questions is of infinitely greater importance than the former class of stories. And yet, the fact remains that out of one thousand people nine hundred and ninety-nine are infinitely more interested in the woman who tried to kill the other woman than they are in the rival merits of the Aldrich and Fowler currency measures. And as long as the vast majority of perfectly worthy people prefer to read about the dramatic, the mysterious, the romantic, the comic, the tragic in human affairs, rather than the important, the World is not in the least ashamed of giving them what they want to read as fully and as prominently as it gives them what they ought to read. The World tries to balance the two types of news, avoiding an appeal to morbidness on the one hand and an appeal to intellectual priggishness on the other. We regret that our poor effort in this direction is unsatisfactory to our fastidious contemporary. All we can say is that we are doing our modest best, according to our humble lights.

Mr. President, either this is a serious libel on the vast majority of "perfectly wholesome and normally intelligent men and women" of America or we need to elevate the standard of "normal intelligence." I prefer to believe that the World is mistaken in its estimate of its own readers. I am afraid that great journal is mistakenly catering to and increasing the numbers of its unintelligent and abnormal readers. That this is just what many newspapers are doing is made clear by the following extract from an article by Edward Alsworth Ross in volume 105 of the Atlantic Monthly, entitled "The suppression of important news":

Most of the criticism launched at our daily newspapers hits the wrong party. Granted they sensationalize vice and crime, "play up" trivialities, exploit the private affairs of prominent people, embroider facts, and offend good taste with screech, blare, and color. But all this may be only the means of meeting the demand, of "giving the public what it wants." The newspaper can not be expected to remain dignified and serious now that it caters to the common millions instead of, as formerly, to the professional and business classes. To interest errand boy and factory girl and raw immigrant it had to become spicy, amusing, emotional, and chromatic. For these blame, then, the American people.

So, according to this learned gentleman, this kind of news is published for the edification of the "errand boy, factory girl, and raw immigrant." This certainly makes one feel more comfortable. It is not the intelligent reader, seeking information, that wants such news, but the ignorant and more often disreputable and criminal class that want to be fed on the details of crime, immorality, accidents, and sensational news of all kinds. If so, it is certainly not creditable to American journalism.

There is still another excuse offered for the publication of the details of crimes. It is maintained that it is a means of detecting and preventing crime. I do not believe either of these claims. I have no doubt that more innocent men have been convicted of crime by this sort of journalism than the number of guilty ones who have been convicted of their crimes by such methods. It has more frequently than not been an embarrassment to officers whose duty it is to detect criminals and bring them to justice. It often conflicts with the courts in their efforts to enforce the law, and in every respect is a hindrance rather than a help to the authorities in the attempt to bring the perpetrators of crime to justice. In an article in the seventeenth volume of the Green Bag, by Clarence Bishop Smith, entitled "Newspapers and the jury," the writer has this to say on the subject:

It needs no argument to prove that the newspaper is an unqualified evil, in so far as it affects the trial of crime. Since the abolition of public executions it has been the policy of the law to hide all sensational details connected with the punishment of criminals. The object of most newspapers is just the reverse of this. By picturesque methods they seek to make their readers see every incident from the conception of the crime in the brain of the man on trial down to the jury's verdict and the crime's punishment, if there be punishment. Consequently the newspapers must always come in conflict with the courts. They are, however, here to stay and we must meet the situation. We can not curb the freedom of the press or prevent the public from reading accounts of crime which ought not to be published, but we should recognize these various dangers arising from changing social conditions and study to minimize them. While the influence of the newspaper is subtle, it is very strong and may easily impair our trial system almost without our knowing it. For this reason the subject deserves the consideration of the bench and bar.

But, Mr. President, besides the fact that this excuse is not well founded it is not sincere, if we judge by the course of the newspapers themselves. They do not publish such news only where the criminal is unknown or undetected; they publish it indiscriminately, whether the perpetrator of the crime is known or unknown. We have had conspicuous proof of this very recently. On last Christmas eve, here in Washington, the Capital of this Nation, a good woman was brutally outraged. Her assailant was detected and arrested on the spot. There was no call for the publication of the details of this revolting crime. There was every reason why they should have been suppressed. No one could be benefited by their publication. They were calculated to arouse the most dangerous of passions in the minds of the ignorant and criminal classes. No respectable person would desire to read them. A just consideration for the feelings of the poor woman who had been so humiliated by being made the victim of such a crime should have stayed the pen of the man who wrote the story. But assuming, I suppose, that it was the kind of news that their readers wanted, the papers published the sickening details of it, filling columns of space. The relations and antecedents of the parties were ferreted out and made public; the description of the crime in all its details was published and the nauseous details of the condition of the clothing of the participants, the bloodstains and the like, were wound into the threads of this disgusting and sensational story. Was there any excuse for it? None whatever. The very publication of it disproved the sincerity of the claims made in justification of such journalism. If it be true that a majority of the readers of the papers that published this so-called news wanted that kind of news, it should be the highest aim and purpose of the right kind of newspapers to withhold it from its morbid and unwholesome readers, not only in their interest and in the interest of its more wholesome-minded readers, who do not want it, but in justice to itself.

Mr. President, there is another and more pleasing side to this important question. I have pointed out as best I could the evils of bad and unwholesome journalism. Surely they are serious enough to challenge the attention of all normal and wholesome-minded people. But the newspaper will continue to exist. Rightly conducted it is a great educator. Its facilities for spreading and disseminating news good or bad and sentiments pure and impure exceed all other means of reaching the public. A well-conducted newspaper, containing useful and educational news truthfully told, is a powerful instrument for the spread of information and the education of the public mind. Such newspapers, once the reliability of their news and the purity of their character are established, are most powerful influences for good in any community. Individual character and public sentiment are elevated and purified by such journalism. Disbelief in and suspicion of present-day journalism have become proverbial.

If newspapers tell the truth, it is not believed, because of the almost if not quite universal distrust of them, born of their general unreliability. The journalists who have brought the newspaper to this discreditable pass have much to answer for. What a splendid work they might have done for humanity by making the newspaper a truthful index of current events and useful knowledge, the vehicle for pure and lofty sentiments, and the prosecutor of evil and the defender of good. There are newspapers that are earnestly striving to reach such a standard of true and useful journalism. They are doing a wonderful work. They are, to some extent, leavening the lump of coarse and unreliable journalism and helping to educate the public mind to a just appreciation of a real newspaper. The opportunity of such a newspaper as an educator of the public mind is boundless, but it is an opportunity that has been sadly neglected in the effort to make money and the seeming desire to pander to the lowest and most vicious instincts of humanity.

Mr. President, the bill I have introduced will probably never become a law. The cry will be raised that it is an effort to muzzle the press and censor the news, and this is usually all powerful when it is raised for the protection of the newspapers, although other purveyors of information, through the moving pictures and otherwise, appeal to it in vain. This is a discrimination in favor of the newspaper that finds no justification in law or justice. It has been my main purpose to call the attention of the country to one of the greatest, most powerful, and most corrupting evils and influences of the present age. It is an evil which I admit can not be overcome by law. It must be met by a better and purer public sentiment that will demand cleaner and more reliable journalism. This better and more exalted sentiment may and probably will find expression in legislative enactments in the several States from time to time as the sentiment grows, as it surely must if our civilization, moral purity, and civic righteousness are to be maintained. Federal legislation on the subject must of necessity be limited in its scope and effect. It would mean more as an example and as a national expression of condemnation of corrupt and unreliable and approval of clean journalism and a powerful stimulant of a better and more exalted public sentiment on the subject than as a practicable, enforceable penal or restrictive law. Let us hope, Mr. President, that public sentiment will soon so improve that restrictive laws will not be needed.

Mr. President, I have endeavored to present this important question with entire frankness and with malice toward none and charity for all newspapers. If it be true that the intelligent people demand impure and deleterious news, as some of the newspapers declare, conditions will inevitably grow worse and worse unless their mental food is changed. A depraved appetite grows on what it feeds upon. Such news increases the morbid desire for the sensational, the impure, and the horrible. Intelligent men and women cleanse their bodies, but fill their minds with impurities far more dangerous and degrading than an unwashed body. A pure mind makes a wholesome and healthy body. Purity of thought and conscience on the part of the people as a whole will make this country great and prosperous in the truest sense. The man who helps to make the public mind impure, whether he be a journalist or not, is a dangerous man and an enemy to the best interests of his country.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 20 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 3 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, April 21, 1913, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 17, 1913.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Throw Thy loving arms, O God our Father, round about us, that we may be strong and pure, noble and brave, that the things which make for the universal and eternal values of life, fatherhood, brotherhood, may weave themselves into the tissues of the soul so that when the storms of adversity beat upon us, disappointments come thick and fast, sorrows encompass like clouds, and grief pours itself out like rain upon our face, we may be strong in Thee after the similitude of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Monday, April 14, was read and approved.

SWEARING IN OF MEMBERS.

The SPEAKER. There are certain Members present who desire to be sworn in. They will present themselves, and the oath of office will be administered to them.

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia, Mr. GUERNSEY, Mr. HAUGEN, and Mr. BARNHART appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the appointment of Mr. Burleson to the Cabinet created a vacancy in the tenth district of Texas, which has just been filled by the election of J. P. BUCHANAN. His certificate of election has not yet arrived, but there is no contest, and I ask unanimous consent that he may be permitted to take the oath of office.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, my recollection is that under the law of Texas there has to be 30 or 40 days after the election before the result is canvassed; but in this case there is no question, there having been only one candidate.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. There were two candidates, but there is no question about the election, as Mr. BUCHANAN had a majority of over 3,000. He has a letter from his opposing candidate making no objection.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Member will be sworn in.

Mr. BUCHANAN appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States, was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

THE SPEAKER'S LOBBY.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to make a statement to the House which he has been requested to make. Members now have no desks, and once in a while they want to write a letter. The Doorkeeper has provided tables in the Speaker's lobby, with pens, paper, ink, and so forth, and he requests that Members deposit their hats and coats in the cloakroom instead of in the lobby, so that Members can there avail themselves of the facilities for writing letters.

THE COMMITTEE ON RULES.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. Is it a privileged resolution?

Mr. HENRY. It is not.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 48.

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be authorized to have such printing and binding done as may be required in the transaction of its business.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. STEDMAN, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence for 10 days, on account of illness in his family.

THE WATERS OF THE NIAGARA RIVER.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Speaker, the bill H. R. 2498 was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The bill was drawn for the purpose of carrying out the law contemplated in the treaty between Canada and the United States for the fixing of the international boundary line. Several bills have been referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and I think this ought to be so referred.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. ADAMSON and Mr. MANN reserved the right to object.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2498) for the control and regulation of the waters of the Niagara River above the Falls of Niagara, and for other purposes.

Mr. ADAMSON. What is the request?

The SPEAKER. To change the reference to the Committee on Foreign Affairs from the gentleman's committee, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, of which the gentleman was chairman, and of which, I presume, he will again be the chairman. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana if this is substantially the same bill that was reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs in the last House?

Mr. CLINE. It is the same bill, and I reintroduced it. It was perfected after a year's hearing in the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. ADAMSON. As it appears that the Committee on Foreign Affairs has been dealing with these bills heretofore, I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. That is the committee to which it ought to go. There are some bills which may be referred to two or three committees; but inasmuch as the clerks had 3,000 bills to refer in one night, it is not strange that they may have got two or three erroneously referred. Without objection, the change of reference will be made.

There was no objection.

MILEAGE OF MEMBERS, ETC.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill making appropriations for certain expenses incident to the first session of the Sixty-third Congress, and for other purposes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would inquire of the gentleman if this bill has yet been introduced?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman mean through the basket?

Mr. MANN. I mean prior to to-day?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; it has not.

The SPEAKER. This bill carries a mileage of the Members. If any gentleman desires the rule enforced, the Chair is ready to enforce it now.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, while I recognize the situation, that the Committee on Appropriations has not yet been appointed and can not report a bill of this sort as a privileged matter, it does not seem to me that the House ought to commence passing appropriation bills, covering six pages, containing a good many items, until the bills have been printed, at least, so that Members may have an opportunity to see them.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the bill is in print. It is available, and it is very simple. If read by the gentleman, he would understand it thoroughly. There is nothing new or startling in it.

Mr. MANN. About 20 minutes ago I obtained a copy of the bill through the courtesy of a member of the former Committee on Appropriations. I have not yet had an opportunity to scan it very carefully. There are several items in it that I think we ought to have an opportunity to see; and while I appreciate the desire of some gentlemen in reference to a particular item in the bill, yet I do not think it ought to come up in this way.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have less interest in it than any other Member in the House. I am simply endeavoring to accommodate the public business.

Mr. MANN. I understand very well that the gentleman from New York is not acting selfishly at all, but I think the bill would better be introduced, so that Members may have an opportunity to see and read it. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I will give notice at this time that I shall ask recognition on Monday next to pass the bill under suspension of the rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

RESIGNATION FROM A COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that he has in his possession—but has mislaid it momentarily—a letter from the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KINDEL], resigning from the Committee on Accounts. Without objection, the resignation will be accepted, and the Chair asks unanimous consent to place the letter in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The following is the communication referred to:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., April 12, 1913.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CLARK: I hereby present you my resignation as a member of the Committee on Accounts to which the Committee on Ways and Means has appointed me. I have notified Mr. UNDERWOOD, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, and Mr. LLOYD, chairman of the Committee on Accounts, of my desire to be relieved from this duty. My reason for asking to be relieved is that I have been indorsed by the Members of the Colorado delegation for membership on the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Very truly, yours, GEO. J. KINDEL.

REPORTS OF OFFICERS OF THE HOUSE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House for the purpose of printing, not reading, the reports of the various officers of the House.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, are the documents to which the Speaker refers reports of the various officers of the House?

The SPEAKER. They are.

Mr. MURDOCK. I will ask the Speaker if he knows whether there are included in these documents the contribution and expenditure statements of the various candidates which are on file with the Clerk of the House? I refer to the election expense accounts.

The SPEAKER. They are not.

Mr. MURDOCK. Are they not a part of the records of the Clerk, and ought they not to be printed as a part of his report?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know. The truth about it is that neither the Clerk nor anyone else knows exactly what to do with these statements except to file them, under the law.

Mr. MURDOCK. I submit this to the Speaker, that inasmuch as the object of the law was publicity, would it not be a good plan for the Speaker to instruct the Clerk to publish those expense accounts as a part of his report?

The SPEAKER. The Speaker would have instructed the Clerk so to do if the Speaker thought he had any authority in the premises. The Clerk came to the Speaker last summer, when Members first began turning in these statements, and he wanted to know what to do with them. The Speaker told him, after reading the law, that he did not know what to do with them except to file them in the Clerk's office. If any gentleman desires them included in these reports or in the reports of the Clerk, he can make a motion and the Chair will entertain the motion.

Mr. MURDOCK. Then I move that the Clerk of the House be instructed to include in his printed report the statements relating to contributions and expenditures in campaigns by Members of Congress and national political committees on file in his office.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I raise the question of order on the gentleman's motion. It is not in order under the law nor under the rules of the House.

Mr. MURDOCK. The Speaker just invited me to make the motion.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am raising the point of order under the rules of the House. The gentleman would have to introduce a resolution and let it go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. MURDOCK. I have already introduced a resolution, and it has gone to the Committee on Accounts, and the Committee on Accounts has not reported. If I can get at it more rapidly in this way, I am very glad to do it. Does not the gentleman think they ought to be printed?

Mr. HARDWICK. If the gentleman would submit a request for unanimous consent, I would not object to it.

Mr. MURDOCK. But I made the motion.

Mr. HARDWICK. And I make the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from Kansas that he change his motion.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I suggest that we ought not in this way to determine a law that has been passed by Congress. There are certain duties laid upon the Clerk. If one of his duties is to give publicity in a certain form, he should comply with the law; and, if not, the remedy ought to be to change the law.

The SPEAKER. The law does not say a word about publishing these reports.

Mr. MURDOCK. I want to say to the gentleman that the Clerk is an officer of the House, and the House has complete power over the Clerk and can order him to print these reports.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; but printing is only done in a certain way.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman confuses the position of the Clerk as an officer of the House, where it is proper to command him, and his position as a custodian under the law of certain documents. I have no objection to the end sought, but, unlike the gentleman from Kansas, I believe in doing things in order; and it does not occur to me that this is the way to reach that end.

Mr. MURDOCK. I made the motion at the Speaker's invitation, and the point of order has been made against the motion.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] rise?

Mr. LLOYD. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] has offered a resolution, which has been referred to the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. About what?

Mr. LLOYD. About this particular thing which he is discussing now, and his resolution is to provide that these accounts shall be published, or that a statement of them shall be published, as a public document. Now, we have given notice to him that he can appear before that committee and make a statement of the situation. The truth is that these statements are all filed. There is no man on the floor but that can go to the Clerk's office and get a statement of anything he wants to know.

Mr. MURDOCK. But, as the gentleman from Missouri knows, they are not public. Why not let the public get at the figures?

Mr. LLOYD. I beg the gentleman's pardon. So far as the office is concerned, they are published. Now, what he desires to do is to make it a public document. If he does so, it will make a voluminous publication, which will cost several thousand dollars to publish, and it ought not to be passed on now without consideration.

The reports of the treasurers of the several national committees are voluminous; the report of the Democratic treasurer will make a book of two or three hundred pages, the report of the Republican treasurer will make one pretty nearly as large, and the report of the Progressive treasurer will make one as large. The Chief Clerk says if it was required that all the reports be published it would make some 12 or 15 large volumes. Now, I think this matter ought to be investigated. We ought to know something about its expense, and we ought to know something about the necessity for it, without rushing into the consideration of this resolution.

Mr. MURDOCK. Now, Mr. Speaker, there are probably on file with the Clerk some 5,000 statements; some of them are quite lengthy and some of them but a single line or two. I deny that publication will take any such number of volumes as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] indicates. And I want to say this to the gentleman from Missouri: We passed, in recent Congresses, measures dealing with the publicity of campaign accounts. It was not intended merely that those campaign statements should be on file with the Clerk. It was intended that the public should see them.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, as a matter of fact, have they not seen them?

Mr. MURDOCK. If the gentleman will permit me to continue my remarks, one of the laws we passed provided that these documents should be destroyed after being held a certain time by the Clerk.

The thing we want to do is to get these statements published before they are destroyed. It is apparent from what the gentleman from Missouri says here this morning that it is impossible to get unanimous consent on this proposition. It is in the jurisdiction of the House to act on the matter now, and I am going to insist on the motion which the Speaker invited me to make.

Mr. MADDEN and Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan rose.

Mr. MURDOCK. I yield first to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman made the statement that the expenses were intended for publication. As a matter of fact, has not every newspaper in the United States published them?

Mr. MURDOCK. Certainly not. They published some of them piecemeal and in fragments, and not in their entirety. Let us see what the Congressmen and the candidates for President and their committees expended in the first national campaign where the law compelled them to make public statements.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield to me?

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON].

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I wanted to ask the gentleman if he has any information as to how many Members of the House have failed to file these statements as required by law?

Mr. MURDOCK. I have not. I do not think that is material to this proposition at all. I think the public is entitled to know who did not file and who did file, and the expenditures of the men who did file.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I am in favor of the publication. I am with the gentleman on that.

Mr. MURDOCK. Then I hope the gentleman will vote for my motion.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I thought the gentleman from Kansas might know.

Mr. BARNHART rose.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART].

Mr. BARNHART. Does the motion of the gentleman from Kansas merely contemplate the publication of those reports in the RECORD or in book form, to be distributed as a public document?

Mr. MURDOCK. I wanted it included in this report by the Clerk of the House.

The SPEAKER. The resolution of the gentleman from Kansas is one that has been referred to the Committee on Accounts, looking to the publication of these papers, or whatever it is—perhaps a memorandum—as a public document.

Mr. MURDOCK. My motion, however, Mr. Speaker, does not involve——

Mr. BARNHART. Just a minute. Then the resolution would properly come before the Committee on Printing and not before the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. It is difficult to tell where it would go.

Mr. MANN. The Committee on Printing has not yet been appointed, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, as I understand the point of order pending, it seems to me clearly that the point of order is well taken. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] has introduced a resolution. It has been referred to the appropriate committee, and it is subject to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. While the Chair invited the gentleman from Kansas to make the motion——

Mr. FITZGERALD. That makes no difference, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows that. While the Chair says he invited the gentleman to make the motion, and is therefore really responsible for it, the Chair did not suppose anybody on earth would object to it—the Chair not being a mind reader. [Laughter.] The Chair thinks the point of order is well taken.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, before the Chair decides the point of order I desire to be heard.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, has the Chair ruled me out of order after having invited me to make a motion?

The SPEAKER. Not yet. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Before the Speaker rules upon the point of order a gentleman on the floor makes a motion.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Has the Speaker ruled upon the point of order?

The SPEAKER. The Speaker has not ruled.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman on the floor makes a motion, after having recognition from the Chair for that purpose. Now, motions are made in order of precedence. A gentleman on the floor secures recognition and offers a motion, which is not a motion of priority, and one can demand the regular order upon him and cut him out, because the regular order will bring before the House something which takes precedence over it. But what would a demand for the regular order bring before the House now? Nothing. There is nothing in order before the House, except a motion to adjourn.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; but the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. MANN. That is always in order, notwithstanding a motion may be pending. Now, there is nothing on the calendar, and the Speaker having stated that it was a work of supererogation to call the calendar when nothing is pending thereon, the next thing in order is unfinished business. There is no unfinished business, and the next order of business is to resolve the House into Committee of the Whole House; but there is nothing to resolve upon in the Committee of the Whole House. There is nothing before the House which takes precedence of a motion made from the floor when recognition is given for that purpose.

Of course the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] can mend the matter, if he has the votes, by moving to adjourn, but I contend that, without the motion to adjourn, any motion offered on the floor to-day, with the House in the situation it is in, is in order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is mistaken in the proposition that was made by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK]. He did not demand the regular order. He made a point of order that the motion of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] was not in order because it should be referred to the appropriate committee of the House. It was referred to the appropriate committee of the House, and whether there is actually an appropriate committee existing or not to consider the matter does not affect the case; and a resolution of this kind is clearly not in order to come up until it has been referred to the appropriate committee.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield to me first?

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman from Alabama yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] misunderstands my motion and confuses it with my resolution. My motion was that the Clerk of the House be instructed to include in his report, which is submitted to the House for printing, the statements on file in regard to campaign expenditures. My resolution looks to the publication of this statement in a public document. My motion is clearly different from my resolution. The gentleman is talking about my resolution, not about my motion.

Mr. MANN. If I understand the object of the gentleman from Kansas, it is to move now to insert in the report of the Clerk a statement of these expenditures.

Mr. MURDOCK. That is my motion.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from Kansas know that the report that the Clerk is now making is for the fiscal year ending last year?

Mr. MURDOCK. Oh, yes; and I will also say to the gentleman from Illinois that, as he knows, the report of the Clerk, which is to be filed and printed, also includes certain expenditures on the part of Members of Congress in detail.

Mr. MANN. What is it that makes the gentleman from Kansas think the Clerk makes a report now? The Clerk makes annual reports, but those reports are not made at this session of Congress, toward the close of the fiscal year, but at the regular session of Congress, at the end of the fiscal year. I do not think we want to wait until next December to obtain this routine information. As I understand, various gentlemen who are on the floor, or who are seeking by contests to obtain the floor, have not made reports as required by acts of Congress.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman is always seeking for a technicality.

Mr. MANN. For instance, the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. McDonald, who is seeking a seat here, has not made such a report. I want to find out whether the law has been complied with now, and not in December.

Mr. MURDOCK. Then, why does not the gentleman from Illinois want publicity?

Mr. MANN. I always do.

Mr. MURDOCK. Why does he always come out, on a measure of this kind, and put in a technicality to defeat the purpose? Why does he not stand for publicity? What objection is there to the Clerk of the House publishing this statement?

Mr. MANN. On the other hand, I was endeavoring to put in a technicality to sustain the gentleman's motion, which he did not know enough about the rules to make.

Mr. MURDOCK. "The gentleman from Kansas" does not ask the help of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has the floor on the point of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, so far as securing publicity in this manner is concerned, there is absolutely nothing in it. These reports are on file in the Clerk's office. They have been on file for months. There is not a local newspaper in the United States that has not investigated them and published them already. I have no objection to their republication if it can be done in an orderly way and at a reasonable cost, but I think it is improper for the gentleman to inject a motion here that may cost thousands of dollars, without the consideration of a committee. The gentleman himself has recognized that it should be considered in an orderly way by a committee, and has introduced a resolution and had it referred to the committee. I think he ought to pursue his proposition in the way in which he started to pursue it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. MURDOCK. In justice to me.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. MURDOCK. On the first day of this session I attempted to get unanimous consent to have these statements published, and I was beaten by a motion to adjourn, being taken off my feet in that way, and the unanimous consent was refused. Then I took the regular course of introducing the resolution. Now, this morning the opportunity offers itself to get these statements published. I do not think the gentleman was quite within the facts when he said that these statements had been generally published. They have not been generally published. I have a statement in there—quite a long one—and I want to say to the gentleman that I do not think there is a soul on earth who has ever seen that statement since it was filed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Nobody was interested in it.

Mr. FOSTER. Why did not the gentleman publish it in his own paper?

Mr. MURDOCK. There was no particular demand that it be published at that time, but I will be glad to publish it. I am anxious to have all statements published. I do not believe in keeping these things back, and I do not think the gentleman from Alabama ought to interpose an objection at this point. These statements will be published eventually. Why not publish them now?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Alabama and the gentleman from Kansas to the fact that I have been reliably informed by an officer of the House that if these statements are published in a book of the form of Webster's Unabridged Dictionary they will fill four volumes of that size.

Mr. MURDOCK. And they will not be bigger than——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman permit me to do my own talking?

Mr. MURDOCK. Certainly I will, although the gentleman interrupts when I speak.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Or if they are printed in the form of an ordinary House document they will fill 30 volumes. Because no newspaper in this country thought it was of sufficient news value to publish the gentleman's statement as to his election expenses—and even his own newspaper did not think it was of sufficient importance to waste valuable space in publishing it—is no reason why this House, without any investigation or a report from a committee, should gratify the gentleman's desire to publish these statements. My statements were published in most of the metropolitan papers in New York and Boston, and in many magazines, showing that there was much keener interest in the manner in which my money was expended than the public had in the manner in which the gentleman from Kansas expended his.

Mr. MURDOCK. Upon which the gentleman congratulates me, of course.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And the gentleman from Kansas realizes as an experienced newspaper man that the press publishes those things in which it believes the public is most keenly interested. I do not know whether the gentleman is to be congratulated.

Mr. MURDOCK. I thought the gentleman wished to congratulate me.

Mr. FITZGERALD. My statement showed accurately the contributions that helped me in my campaign and the expenditures that were made.

Mr. MURDOCK. Did the gentleman have contributions?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I did.

Mr. MURDOCK. I did not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And they were so modest, both in the amounts received and the amounts expended, that they attracted universal attention. Perhaps as much can not be said in behalf of the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. MURDOCK. I will say to the gentleman that I had no contributions.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There were some people who, at least, thought my public services were of such value that they were willing to help me to be returned, even if nobody thought that of the gentleman from Kansas. [Laughter.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a ruling of the Chair on the point of order, so that the House may proceed.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL MONDAY NEXT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Those of us who are not privileged to enter the Democratic caucus which is considering the tariff bill would like to know when the gentleman intends to report the tariff bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman that we will report it at as early a date after the Democratic caucus has concluded its consideration of the bill as it is practicable to do so. [Laughter.]

Mr. LANGLEY. And further, the deponent sayeth not.

Mr. MURDOCK. I would like to ask the gentleman seriously, What part of the Democratic caucus is secret? The claim has been made to me that there is a part of the Democratic caucus that is not secret. Can any Member of this House attend the Democratic caucus?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state to the gentleman from Kansas that so far as my observation goes and as far as the newspapers are concerned there has been no part of the Democratic caucus that has been secret up to this time. [Laughter.]

Mr. MURDOCK. I would like to ask the gentleman if there is a roll call in the Democratic caucus?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I want to say to the gentleman from Kansas that I am proud of the Democratic rules so far as proposing an open caucus is concerned, because the Democratic caucus blazed the way to give publicity to caucus action. It is the only legislative body that I know of in the United States that did blaze the way, when my friend from Kansas was located in a secret caucus where nothing could come out, where not even a blast of dynamite could blow it out.

The Democratic Party established the rule in its caucus that every resolution should be entered in the journal and the journal should be kept open not only to members of the caucus but to the press and everybody else interested, so that they can inspect it and see what has been done. That journal is kept like the Journal of the House, on the same principle, with all matters of legislation embraced in it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will it be published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No. If the gentleman will allow me——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, is this debate being carried on on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama, that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet at a future day?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is being carried on by unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN. I did not know how long the unanimous consent might last.

Mr. MURDOCK. We are getting information, and therefore the gentleman from Illinois might object.

Mr. MANN. We can not on this side hear what the two gentlemen of the Democratic Party on the opposite side of the House are saying. The gentleman from Kansas is where he belongs, on the Democratic side of the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. With the leave of the gentleman from Illinois, does the gentleman from Kansas desire me to answer his question?

Mr. MURDOCK. I do.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If I may have order, Mr. Speaker. As I was saying, every resolution which is offered in the Democratic caucus is entered in the journal, is open to inspection, and given to the newspapers if they desire to print it.

Mr. ASHBROOK. With the permission of the gentleman from Alabama I will say, as secretary of the Democratic caucus, that the minutes are examined almost every day by Members of the House and by newspaper reporters and others who desire to examine them. They are open to the public.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman put those in the RECORD, so that we may all see them?

Mr. ASHBROOK. I will if I am authorized to do so.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Kansas that our journal is open to him as well as his newspaper, and if he is interested in the matter we would be glad to see that he has an opportunity to scan the journal, but there is no use in taking up space in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to print them for those who are not interested. If the gentleman is interested in it he can do like other newspaper men do, inspect it, and then if he wants to print it in his home paper he has full opportunity to do so.

Mr. MURDOCK. I thank the gentleman from Alabama for his explanation, and think it has been quite full. The Democratic caucus does not admit reporters nor the public to the conferences, and therefore the journal is prepared in secret caucus and given only to inquirers.

Mr. FOSTER and Mr. SISSON called for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded, and the regular order is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is to vote on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman yielded for a question.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman can not yield for a question when the regular order is demanded.

Mr. MOORE. I merely wanted to know if the Republican——

[Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. It does not make any difference what the gentleman wants to know. The regular order is demanded, and the question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next at 12 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Then, on motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD (at 12 o'clock and 42 minutes p. m.), in accordance with the order heretofore made, the House adjourned until Monday, April 21, 1913, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of Commerce, asking authority to pay the rental for a refrigerator plant in one of the buildings of the Department of Commerce out of the appropriation for the contingent expenses of that department (H. Doc. No. 32), was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

SENATE.

MONDAY, April 21, 1913.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D.

JOHN W. WEEKS, a Senator from the State of Massachusetts, appeared in his seat to-day.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last was read and approved.

CHEAT AND NEW RIVERS, VA. AND W. VA.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 8th instant, photostat copies of all papers, correspondence, rulings, permits (without maps), etc., of the record in the War Department pertaining to the construction of dams or reservoirs by private parties in the Cheat and New Rivers, in Virginia and West Virginia, which, on motion of Mr. NELSON, was, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PAGE. I present a joint resolution of the Legislature of Vermont, favoring the so-called Francis amendment to section 4747 of the Revised Statutes relating to the attachment of pensions of United States soldiers and sailors under any legal or equitable process. I ask that the joint resolution be read and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was read and referred to the Committee on Pensions, as follows:

Joint resolution relating to a request to the Vermont delegation in Congress.

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives, That the Vermont delegation in Congress assembled be informed in the proper manner that it is the sense of the General Assembly of the State of Vermont that section 4747 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended as proposed by Representative FRANCIS, of Ohio.

FRANK E. HOWE,
President of the Senate.
CHARLES A. PLUMLEY,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Approved February 13, 1913.

ALLEN M. FLETCHER, Governor.

STATE OF VERMONT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of a joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution relating to a request to the Vermont delegation in Congress," approved February 13, 1913, as appears by the files and records of this office.

Witness my signature and the seal of this office at Montpelier this 4th day of March, 1913.

[SEAL.]

GUY W. BAILEY,
Secretary of State.

Mr. GALLINGER presented a petition of sundry citizens of Goffstown, N. H., and a petition of sundry citizens of Portsmouth, N. H., praying for the repeal of the clause in the Panama Canal act exempting American coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls, which were referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

Mr. PERKINS. I present a telegram, in the nature of a joint resolution, adopted by the Legislature of California, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SACRAMENTO, CAL., April 18, 1913.

Hon. GEORGE C. PERKINS, Washington, D. C.:

Pursuant to the provisions of senate joint resolution No. 11, adopted by both houses of the California Legislature, I herewith transmit to you a copy thereof:

"Whereas a bill, House resolution No. 22871, known as the Lever bill, providing for farm demonstrator under the direction of the colleges of agriculture of the various States of the United States, has passed the House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States and is now pending in the Senate: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the senate and assembly jointly, That the legislature heartily approve all of the provisions in said bill and hereby respectfully requests our Senators in Congress to vote for and use every honorable means to secure the passage of said bill by the Senate of the United States as it passed the House of Representatives, without alternation or amendment as to benefits provided: Be it

"Resolved further, That copies of this resolution be sent by telegraph to each of the Senators from California in the Congress of the United States."

W. N. PARRIS,
Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. NELSON. I present a resolution of the Minnesota State Senate, relative to the duty on wheat and other farm products. I ask that the resolution be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas it is reported in the public press that Congress proposes to enact certain tariff legislation by which the duty on wheat is to be reduced 10 cents per bushel and flour and other products of wheat are to be admitted free of duty, and that the duty on other farm products is to be materially reduced; and

Whereas the admission of flour and other products of wheat without any duty will, in effect, amount to removing the tariff on wheat, in so far as the price of wheat to the producer is concerned; and

Whereas it is not apparent that Congress contemplates any reduction in the tariff which will in any manner adequately compensate the farmers for the loss occasioned to them by reason of the admission of wheat and farm products with such materially reduced rates of duty: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Minnesota, That we hereby protest against any action of Congress reducing the tariff on wheat or other farm products.

STATE OF MINNESOTA, Legislative Department, ss:

I, George W. Peachey, secretary of the Senate of the State of Minnesota for the thirty-eighth session thereof, do hereby certify that I have carefully compared the foregoing paper writing with the original resolution of the senate, introduced on the 8th day of April, 1913, by Senator George H. Sullivan, and that the same is a true and correct copy thereof.

GEO. W. PEACHEY,
Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. NELSON presented a memorial of the Joseph Ullmann Co., of New York, N. Y., remonstrating against placing a duty on raw furs, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WORKS presented a petition of members of the Homesteaders' Irrigation Co., of Rannells, Cal., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the conservation of the waters of the Colorado River, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GOFF presented a memorial of the National Window Glass Workers' Union of Salem, W. Va., remonstrating against a reduction of the duty on window glass, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GRONNA presented a resolution adopted by the Ministerial Association of Grand Forks, N. Dak., favoring the enactment of legislation compelling the observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented the petition of John Orchard, of Dickinson, N. Dak., and a petition of the Grocery Co. of Minot, N. Dak., praying for a reduction of the duty on sugar, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of members of the Commercial Club of Minot, N. Dak., remonstrating against any reduction in the duty on wheat and barley, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. STERLING. I present a letter signed by Charles A. Lum, secretary of the South Dakota Millers' Association, relative to the duty on wheat. I ask that the paper be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. D. & S. W. M. M. C.,
Aberdeen, S. Dak., April 14, 1913.

Hon. THOMAS STERLING,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: The millers of South Dakota most respectfully and urgently call your attention to the new tariff law proposed to be enacted by the majority party in Congress as it will affect the milling industry of this State. As we understand the proposed bill, it provides for a tariff of 10 cents per bushel on wheat and 10 per cent ad valorem on flour coming from countries that tax American flour but free flour coming from countries that do not tax American flour. That means that England, which does not tax our flour, and Canada, which can easily remove its tax, the two greatest competitors in the manufacture of flour we have in the world, can import flour into this country free, while we have to pay 10 cents per bushel tariff on imported wheat.

We protest against this injustice most earnestly. It will practically result in driving the milling business out of the United States into Canada and England.

Note the effect of 10 cents per bushel tariff on wheat. At a dollar per bushel it means 10 per cent. But wheat is usually cheaper than $1, and on 90-cent wheat this would be a tax of 11.1 per cent, and on 80-cent wheat a tax of 12.5 per cent, and so on; the cheaper the wheat the heavier per cent of tax against it.

The ad valorem tariff of 10 per cent on flour acts in this same way. A specific tax of 50 cents per barrel on flour would be about the equivalent of 10 cents per bushel on wheat at a dollar a bushel.

On the other hand, the English mill, at present prices all around, can import wheat from Argentina, pay water transportation to Liverpool, grind it into flour, pay water transportation to New York, Boston, or any American seaport, and sell its flour in New York at $3.97½ per barrel, while it will cost the American mill to import wheat from Argentina, pay transportation and duty of 10 cents per bushel, $4.41 per barrel, the cost of the raw material in both instances.

The average profit of the American mill on flour is about 5 cents per barrel.

But this advantage to the Liverpool mill is 43½ cents per barrel. Many of our South Dakota mills ship flour to these eastern cities.

But the advantage to the Liverpool mill would be much greater than this because of the added profit to them of the by-products of flour in England. They get about $5 to $6 per ton more for their offal than the American mill gets at home. This reduces the cost of their flour 22½ cents to 28 cents per barrel.

Free Canadian flour and taxed Canadian wheat would operate the same way. The competition of these two countries would drive the milling business out of the United States entirely. Both in production of wheat and in milling capacity Canada is progressing by leaps and bounds. United States millers are already locating in Canada.

The millers of the United States want fair play. If wheat is to be taxed, its products and by-products should be taxed equally.

Therefore we ask for a duty of 10 cents per bushel on wheat and 10 per cent ad valorem on the products of wheat, to be made absolute, to apply on all importations.

We trust you will use your influence to secure justice to the milling industry of this country and of this State in the matter of this new tariff, as millions of dollars' worth of property, labor, and fertilizers are at stake in this matter.

Very respectfully, yours,

CHAS. A. LUM,
Secretary South Dakota Millers' Club.

Mr. JONES. I present a number of telegrams from labor organizations of my State relative to prompt action being taken looking to an investigation of working conditions in the coal mines in West Virginia. I move that the telegrams be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JONES presented a resolution adopted by the City Council of Spokane, Wash. favoring the enactment of legislation providing for the Government ownership of all telegraph and telephone lines, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. SHIVELY presented a memorial of Local Union No. 33, Cigar Makers' International Union, of Indianapolis, Ind., remonstrating against the free admission into the United States of cigars made in the Philippine Islands, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Prescott, Ariz., praying for a reduction of the annual assessment on mining claims, to be expended on the county roads leading to or through the mining districts in which the respective mining claims are located, which was referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. OLIVER. I present a memorial signed by over 200 employees of the Railway Steel Spring Co., of Latrobe, Pa., protesting against a reduction in the duty on wheels used for railway purposes and on railway tires. It is a very short memorial, and I ask that the memorial, but not the signatures, be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the request? That a memorial be printed in the RECORD?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The request of the Senator from Pennsylvania is that the memorial be printed in the RECORD, without the names.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is there any special reason why it should be printed in the RECORD?

Mr. OLIVER. I think there is. It is a statement on the part of workingmen of the injury that will be done to them by the proposed reduction. If the Senator desires——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will not object.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, omitting the names, as follows:

LATROBE, PA., April 18, 1913.

Hon. GEORGE T. OLIVER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We, the undersigned, residents of this State, hereby respectfully call your attention to the matter of the proposed reduction in the tariff on "Wheels for railway purposes and parts thereof, etc., and other railway tires or parts thereof, etc.," now pending before Congress.

The proposed reduction in the tariff on the above-mentioned products would seriously affect one of the most important industries as carried on by the Railway Steel Spring Co. in the town of Latrobe, and would positively result in the cessation of that company's activities at Latrobe. It is well known to you that the Railway Steel Spring Co. is one of the best wage-paying factories in Latrobe, and upon its operation a great many workmen and their families depend.

We therefore earnestly petition you to use all honorable means at your command to prevent the proposed reduction in the tariff on the above-mentioned products.

Mr. OLIVER presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Beaver Falls, Pa., remonstrating against a reduction of the duty on glass and glassware, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of sundry business men of Pittsburgh, Pa., remonstrating against a reduction of the duty on wheels for railway purposes, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of members of the Ministers' Association of Shenandoah, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation to regulate the hours of labor in continuous working plants in the country, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. McLEAN presented a resolution adopted by the Board of Trade of Hartford, Conn., favoring the selection of that city as the headquarters for the customs district of Connecticut, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CLAPP presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Minneapolis, Minn., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation compelling the observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. LODGE presented petitions of William Hooper and 94 other citizens of Manchester; of Conover Fitch and 47 other citizens of Waltham; and of F. E. Lane and 147 other citizens of Milton, all in the State of Massachusetts, praying for the repeal of the clause in the Panama Canal act exempting American coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls, which were referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the New England Hardware Dealers' Association, favoring the adoption of 1-cent postage on first-class mail matter, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE presented petitions of sundry citizens of Brule, Wis., praying for a reduction of the duty on sugar, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Milwaukee, Wis., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the closing of the gates of the Panama Exposition on Sundays, which were referred to the Committee on Industrial Expositions.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY DIRECT VOTE.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I present a certified copy of a joint resolution passed by the Legislature of South Dakota ratifying the proposed amendment to section 3, Article I, of the Constitution, relating to the manner of electing Senators of the United States. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF SOUTH DAKOTA,
DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, State of South Dakota, ss:

I, Frank Glasner, secretary of state of the State of South Dakota, do hereby certify that the annexed bill, to wit, joint resolution No. 16, was duly passed by the 1913 session of the Legislature of the State of South Dakota.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State of South Dakota this 16th day of April, A. D. 1913.

[SEAL.]

FRANK GLASNER,
Secretary of State,
By J. T. NELSON,
Assistant Secretary of State.

A joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of South Dakota, ratifying and approving the proposed amendment to the first paragraph of section 3 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States, and in lieu of so much of paragraph 2 of same section as relates to the filling of vacancies.

Whereas the Congress of the United States by a joint resolution, passed June 12, 1911, proposed as an amendment to the first paragraph of section 3 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States, and in lieu of so much of paragraph 2 of same section as relates to the filling of vacancies, and submitted the same to the various States for ratification and approval, which said amendment is in words and figures as follows:

"The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote. The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite of the most numerous branch of the State legislatures.

"When vacancies happen in the representation of any State in the Senate, the executive authority of such State shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies: Provided, That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointments until the people fill the vacancies by election as the legislature may direct.

"This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as part of the Constitution:"

Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of South Dakota (the House of Representatives concurring), That the foregoing joint resolution of the Congress of the United States, being the seventeenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, be, and the same is hereby, adopted, approved, and ratified by the Legislature of the State of South Dakota.

STATE OF SOUTH DAKOTA, Office of Secretary of State, ss:

Filed February 27, 1913, at 10.10 o'clock a. m.

FRANK GLASNER,
Secretary of State,
By J. T. NELSON,
Assistant Secretary of State.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I wish to state that the secretary of state of South Dakota sent a duplicate copy of the joint resolution to the Secretary of the Senate, which, I suspect, may have been intended for the Secretary of State. Out of an abundance of caution I ask for an order directing that the copy so received by him be forwarded to the Secretary of State.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

SIZE AND COLOR OF CURRENCY.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask that the reference of the bill (S. 1185) prohibiting changes in size and color of currency without the consent of Congress be changed from the Committee on Finance to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The junior Senator from Texas asks that the Committee on Finance be discharged from the further consideration of the bill he has indicated and that the same be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the title of the bill be read.

Th VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1185) prohibiting changes in size and color of currency without the consent of Congress.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Committee on Finance will be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it will be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

ESTATE OF WILLIAM E. PRESSEY.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution No. 56, submitted by Mr. JOHNSON of Maine on the 17th instant, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the Senate to the executor of the estate of William E. Pressey, late messenger at the card door of the Senate, a sum equal to six months' salary at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I report back with an amendment in the nature of a substitute Senate resolution No. 40, submitted by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON] on the 12th instant, and I submit a report (No. 10) thereon. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendment was to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert:

That the Committee on Military Affairs, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized to send for persons and papers and to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not to exceed $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before said committee; that the committee may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate, and that expenses contracted hereunder shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON TERRITORIES.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am directed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution No. 54, submitted by the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] on the 17th instant, to report it favorably with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, and I submit a report (No. 11) thereon. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendment was to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert:

That the Committee on Territories, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized, during the Sixty-third Congress, to send for persons and papers and to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I report back Senate resolution No. 47, submitted by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] on the 15th instant, with an amendment striking out all after the resolving clause and inserting a substitute, and I submit a report (No. 9) thereon. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

The Senate by unanimous consent proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendment was to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert:

That the Committee on Public Lands, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized during the Sixty-third Congress to send for persons and papers and to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer, at a price not to exceed $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

WORK OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I had intended to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia whether it is the purpose to hold meetings of that committee at an early date, but I see that that Senator is not in his seat.

There have been hundreds of bills introduced in the present session that have been referred to committees. A number of those bills have gone to the Committee on the District of Columbia. The committees of the Senate were fully organized during the special session in March. I see no reason why these bills should not be taken up by the committees and acted upon. I have now some spare time that I would be glad to devote to the work of the committees of which I happen to be a member. Among other committees of which I am a member is the Committee on Public Lands. Numerous of these bills have been referred to that committee. Some of them came over from the last session of Congress, and they are important bills and should be acted upon.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that there is no reason why we should be wasting our time in adjournments for three days without any action on the part of the committees while we have the opportunity now to do work that we can not do at a later period in the session.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. WORKS. I yield.

Mr. BRISTOW. I have been impressed by the remark made by one or two other Senators that we are adjourning from day to day with nothing to do. I wish to suggest to the Senator from California that, so far as the senior Senator from Kansas is concerned, he never has been busier in his life. For one I have been trying to study the legislation which we have been called in special session to enact with a view of informing myself in detail to some extent upon that measure.

I wish to say if any Senator will investigate the tariff and the questions that are involved in it with a view of understanding the various features of the bill we are to consider he will find a great deal to do, without spending every day in committee on other bills.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I think I myself have not been idle in looking into the proposed tariff legislation. I know the disposition of the Senator from Kansas to spend practically all his time upon a bill of that kind. I have not quite that disposition. There is other legislation here that in my judgment is more important than the tariff, and there are a great many Senators who are not spending as much time upon the tariff bill as the Senator from Kansas who could be very well devoting their time to other legislation. I see no reason, notwithstanding what has been said by the Senator from Kansas, why the Senate should not be devoting some of its time to other measures.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I will ask the Senator from California if he has indicated to the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia that he desired him to convene the committee to consider any of the bills to which he refers.

Mr. WORKS. I have not, Mr. President. The chairman of the committee, subject, I believe, to some modifications that have been made by the majority, has the right at all times to call the committee together. I believe at the present time the majority of the committee may take that course if they so desire. I call attention to the matter now not alone with respect to the Committee on the District of Columbia but other committees as well. I have referred to the Committee on Public Lands, which I think is equally important so far as the dispatch of business is concerned.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It has occurred to me, Mr. President, that if the Senator from California had indicated to the chairmen of those committees that he desired to have a meeting to consider any measure which he thought required consideration, he would have gotten a hearing very easily in that way.

Mr. WORKS. I have not had that experience, Mr. President. This is a matter of general importance, and not a mere question of the calling together of one committee.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, in order that the remarks of the Senator from California may not be misunderstood, I will say that I do not know how it is in reference to the particular committees which the Senator has named, but I know it to be a fact that several committees, of which I have the honor to be a member, are not only having meetings, but that each of those committees have questions which have been submitted to subcommittees, and while general committees may not be in session continuously, I am sure there is not a day passes but some important matter is being considered by some of the subcommittees. I am on several of them myself, and I have just had occasion to complain to one of my colleagues here on the Judiciary Committee of having been put on a subcommittee that, by reason of my service on other subcommittees, I would not have time to give proper attention to; and I think that is true as to other committees.

The Senate is not idle by any means when not in session. Senators are very hard at work, and possibly doing very much more laborious and very much more valuable service than they do at any time when the Senate is actually in session.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I appreciate what is said by the Senator from Georgia with respect to the Judiciary Committee. I understand that that committee is holding its regular sessions, and I am very glad to hear it; but there are numerous other committees that are not holding sessions at all.

Mr. BACON. I happen to be on three important committees, and I can speak for all of them—the Committees on the Judiciary, Foreign Relations, and Rules. All of them have certainly been very active and very busy and laboriously engaged ever since the session began.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I came into the Chamber just as the Senator from California was beginning his statement. I understood him to intimate that the tariff hearings or the tariff consideration by the Finance Committee was interfering with other committee meetings. Am I correct in that?

Mr. WORKS. No; I made no such statement, Mr. President.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then I misunderstood the Senator.

Resolved, etc., That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution:

"ART. XVIII. The Congress, whenever a majority of both Houses shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or on the application of the legislatures of 10 States, or on the application of 10 States through the vote of a majority of the electors of each, voting upon the question of such application, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, to be submitted for ratification in each of the several States to the electors qualified to vote for the election of Representatives. And the vote shall be taken at the next ensuing election of Representatives in such manner as the Congress may prescribe. And if in a majority of the States a majority of the electors voting thereon approve any proposed amendment, and if a majority of all the electors voting thereon also approve any proposed amendment, it shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of this Constitution."

By Mr. STERLING:
A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 25) providing for the appointment of a national commission to make investigation and report as to the means and improvements practicable and necessary for the prevention of loss by the overflow of navigable inland waterways; to the Committee on Commerce.

STOCK GAMBLING.

Mr. ASHURST. I introduce a bill and ask that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.
The bill (S. 1311) for the regulation of the use of the mail by stock exchanges and their members, and to amend certain sections of the Criminal Code of the Compiled Statutes of the United States, relating to lotteries, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.
Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I desire to say in connection with the bill I have introduced providing for the regulation and use of the mails by stock exchanges and to amend certain sections of the criminal laws of the United States, that the enormous abuses growing out of stock gamblings have been apparent to us all for some time. I observe in the February, 1913, number of Everybody's Magazine an article upon that subject by a citizen of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, to wit, Mr. Thomas W. Lawson, who caused to be prepared a bill prohibiting stock gambling. I am confident that there is merit in the bill. If enacted into law, should it produce only a small fraction of the beneficial results claimed by its proponents, it would take its place as salutary and wholesome legislation.
I therefore ask unanimous consent that the bill which I introduced and the excerpt from the article in the February, 1913, issue of Everybody's Magazine be printed in the RECORD, and I herewith present the excerpt from the article.
The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? If not, the bill and the matter referred to will be printed in the RECORD.
Mr. BACON subsequently said: I wish to call attention to the fact that the request just made by the Senator from Arizona, which was acted upon, I think, without the Senate being in sufficient order to hear what it was, is in contravention to what has been recognized as the established practice of the Senate, and that is not to include in the RECORD the productions of people who are not Senators. It is not proper that the RECORD should be made the vehicle for carrying to the public the utterances of people who do not belong to this body. I trust the Senator from Arizona will not insist upon that request.
Mr. ASHURST. I ask that a page may return the paper to me, and I will repeat my request.
Mr. BACON. Probably I did not understand it correctly. As I understood the Senator, it was to include in the RECORD an extract from an article which was written by Mr. Thomas W. Lawson. I have no objection to Mr. Thomas W. Lawson, but I object to anyone other than a Senator having the RECORD as a vehicle for communicating with the public.

Mr. ASHURST. I think the fault was mine, in that I did not speak loudly enough or pause sufficiently long to give Senators an opportunity to object.

I now ask unanimous consent that I may include in the RECORD the bill which I have just introduced, together with an excerpt from an article in Everybody's Magazine for February, 1913, in exposition and explanation of the bill.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I must object to the insertion in the RECORD of the article referred to.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I now give notice that immediately after the close of the morning business this morning I shall address myself to this bill, and I further state that I shall read such articles, papers, and proper arguments as I believe to be pertinent to the bill which I have just introduced.

ABROGATION OF TREATIES.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I desire to introduce a joint resolution and ask its reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations. In connection with it I desire to make a very brief statement, but not to make a speech.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon introduces a joint resolution, which will be read.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 22) declaring that the United States are of right freed and exonerated from each and all of the stipulations of the treaties concluded between the United States and Great Britain of dates of April 19, 1850, known as the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and November 18, 1901, known as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 22) declaring that the United States are of right freed and exonerated from each and all of the stipulations of the treaties concluded between the United States and Great Britain of dates of April 19, 1850, known as the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and November 18, 1901, known as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Whereas for many years prior to the 19th day of April, 1850, the matter of constructing a canal connecting the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by the Nicaragua route had been the subject of general discussion, and it was almost unanimously conceded that a canal by the way of the River San Juan de Nicaragua and either or both of the lakes of Nicaragua or Managua to any port or place on the Pacific Ocean was the most feasible under all the circumstances; and

Whereas most of the territory through which such canal would of necessity have to be constructed was under the jurisdiction of the Republic of Nicaragua while Great Britain was attempting to exercise jurisdiction over that part thereof known as the Mosquito Coast at the Atlantic entrance to said proposed canal, and whereas it was desired that there should be no question with reference to the protection of such canal when constructed along the proposed route, the United States and Great Britain, on the 19th day of April, 1850, entered into a treaty known as the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, under and by the terms of which the signatory powers expressed a desire of consolidating the relations of amity which so happily existed between them "by setting forth and fixing in a convention their views and intentions with reference to any means of communication between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by the way of the River San Juan de Nicaragua and either or both of the lakes of Nicaragua or Managua to any port or place on the Pacific Ocean"; and

Whereas the particular object of said treaty was the construction and proper joint protection of a canal over the route indicated in the preamble thereof and no other, nor was any other at that time in the minds of the signatory powers, with the further purpose of establishing a general principle, of extending their protection by treaty stipulations to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway, across the isthmus which connects North and South America, and especially to the interoceanic communications should the same prove to be practicable, whether by canal or railway, which were then proposed to be established by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama; and

Whereas no canal was ever constructed across said Nicaragua route nor were the terms of said treaty nor any of them at any time observed or regarded by Great Britain in any respect or particular, and said treaty was practically abrogated and abandoned by the acts of Great Britain in failing and refusing at all times to observe the material stipulations thereof with reference to occupying, fortifying, colonizing, assuming, and exercising domain over a part of the route over which it was contemplated said canal should be constructed, all against the continued protest of the United States and her constituted authority; and

Whereas after said treaty had been practically and to all intents and purposes abandoned and abrogated, but nevertheless in order to remove any objection which might arise out of the convention of April 19, 1850, to the construction of a canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by whatever route might be considered expedient under the auspices of the Government of the United States alone without impairing the general principle of neutralization established in article 8 of said convention, the United States and Great Britain did on the 18th day of November, 1901, enter into another treaty known as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty; and

Whereas both the parties to said treaty had in mind only the construction of a canal through territory which was under the jurisdiction of a foreign power or powers, and did not have in mind at the time of the execution thereof the construction of a canal on territory entirely subject to the jurisdiction and control of the United States, and said treaty had not and could not have reference to a canal built within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States, and with a full knowledge of the treaty then existing between the United States and New Granada, of date December 12, 1846; and

Whereas after the execution of said Hay-Pauncefote treaty and on the 18th of November 1903, the United States entered into a treaty with the Republic of Panama, under and by the terms of which the United States acquired, for the considerations therein expressed, a grant in perpetuity of the use, occupation, and control of a zone of land and land under water for the construction, maintenance, operation, and protection of a canal, of the width of 10 miles, extending to the distance of 5 miles on each side to the center line of the route of the canal to be constructed, beginning in the Caribbean Sea 3 marine miles from mean low-water mark and extending to and across the Isthmus of Panama into the Pacific Ocean to a distance of 3 marine miles from mean low-water mark; and

Whereas under and by virtue of the terms of said treaty certain rights were reserved to the Republic of Panama with reference to the passage of her ships through said canal, against which Great Britain has not at any time interposed any objection; and

Whereas the United States, at great expense and without any question as to her power, authority, or rights, has constructed a canal across the Isthmus of Panama on territory over which she has sole and exclusive jurisdiction and authority, and has enacted a law for the use of said canal by her own people as well as by other nations, in strict conformity with her duties and obligations to all the maritime powers of the earth, and after the enactment of said law, but before the President's proclamation fixing the canal tolls, Great Britain entered her formal protest against said act as violative of the treaty of November 18, 1901, and in particular to that portion of the act granting free tolls to American vessels engaged in coastwise shipping, which is purely a domestic concern; and

Whereas in said note of protest it is suggested that there are other provisions in said act to which Great Britain may later feel constrained to enter protest, claiming that they are violative of said treaty, particularly that part of said act which forbids the passage through said canal of railroad-owned ships, which provision is intended for the protection of the internal commerce of the United States:

Now, therefore, in order that the views of the Congress of the United States may be understood, and room for future protest and objection upon the part of Great Britain removed, be it

Resolved, That the United States are of right freed and exonerated from each and all of the stipulations of said treaty of April 19, 1850, commonly known as the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and from each and all of the stipulations of said treaty of November 18, 1901, known as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, heretofore concluded between the United States and Great Britain, and that the same shall not nor shall either of them nor any of the stipulations in either thereof contained henceforth be regarded as legally obligatory on the Government or citizens of the United States.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, in connection with and following in the RECORD the joint resolution which I have just introduced, and as a part of what I have to say, I desire to have printed the following: The Clayton-Bulwer treaty between Great Britain and the United States, dated April 19, 1850; the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, of November 18, 1901; then, as showing the relation between Great Britain, the United States, and the Central and South American Republics at the time these treaties were executed, I desire to have printed article 35 of the treaty between the United States and the Republic of New Granada, of December 12, 1846; also, as showing the views that the Congress of the United States has taken in reference to its power and authority, notwithstanding these treaties, with respect to the Panama Canal, I desire to have inserted a copy of the act of June 28, 1902, providing for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, Thirty-second Statutes at Large, page 481; also, as showing the rights acquired by the United States in reference to the treaty through which the canal has been constructed, a copy of the treaty with the Republic of Panama, of November 18, 1903; and, as showing the construction which Congress has placed upon the foregoing treaties, the act providing for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone, approved August 24, 1912, together with the proclamation of the President of the United States fixing the tolls to be charged for vessels passing through the canal pursuant to the provisions of the foregoing act; next in order, as showing the viewpoint of Great Britain, the protest of Mr. A. Mitchell Innes, of date of July 8, 1912, and the protest of Sir Edward Gray, handed to the Secretary of State of the United States by the British ambassador December 9, 1912, and bearing date November 14, 1912, and the reply of Mr. P. C. Knox, Secretary of State, dated January 17, 1913, to the note and protest of Great Britain; also, an article prepared by Mr. Feuille, law officer of the Isthmian Canal Commission, which was printed as a public document, showing from his viewpoint the power of the United States under the treaties with Great Britain; also an article by Judge Samuel Seabury, one of the justices of the Supreme Court of the State of New York, printed as a public document, on the same subject.

Mr. President, in asking that these documents be printed I do not expect to enlighten the American public or this Congress in regard to the relations of the two countries under these very important treaties, but there has been a great deal of discussion with reference to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and much of it, I am sure, has been had without the publication of any consecutive statement as to the terms of the treaties or as to what has been done by this Government or by Great Britain in reference to any of them.

I have not undertaken to get together the correspondence on the part of this Government and the correspondence upon the part of Great Britain with reference to what has been done by the respective Governments under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. The protest of the United States has been repeatedly made in the past that Great Britain has repeatedly violated the terms of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, as the records will disclose. I have simply undertaken to get together consecutively a few of the things that have been done by these powers for the purpose of showing the attitude of the parties and that the United States had rights at the Isthmus of Panama that were exclusive before either the Clayton-Bulwer treaty or the Hay-Pauncefote treaty were executed, all of which must have been known to Great Britain. The Hay-Pauncefote treaty and the Clayton-Bulwer treaty were made with full knowledge that the United States had rights there that these treaties could not and were not intended to impair; and we are now asserting those rights when we ask that both of them be abrogated and annulled, when rights are asserted by Great Britain which were never contemplated at the time the treaties were executed, and particularly in view of the changed conditions in the relations of the parties to the subject of controversy.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is no objection——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I want to suggest to the Senator from Oregon that the documents which he has asked to have placed in the RECORD might with great advantage be printed together as a Senate document.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have no objection.

Mr. LODGE. Perhaps the Senator made that request.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have no objection to that, but I did not make the request, though I am glad to consent thereto.

Mr. LODGE. I think it will be a great convenience to have them together. I offered, and had printed the other day, the correspondence of Sir Edward Grey and Mr. Knox, and I think it would be well to have those all united in this document, in one pamphlet.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I shall be very glad to have that done.

Mr. LODGE. If there is no objection, I make the request that they also be printed as a Senate document.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, it was impossible, in the enumeration of these various acts, communications, and treaties, to judge whether or not there had been a careful enumeration of all of them. I do not know how exhaustively the Senator from Oregon has made his examination. It is very important, if these documents are thus printed, and especially if they are going to be printed as a document, that the document should be absolutely complete, and that everything which is pertinent to the question should be included in convenient form. If the Senator from Oregon will say that he has had an exhaustive examination made, of course I am willing to depend upon his judgment. If otherwise, if it is to take this permanent form, I would suggest to the Senator from Oregon that possibly it might be well to withhold his joint resolution until he can make a further examination and see whether or not he has included everything which should be included.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator from Georgia will allow me, I will withdraw my request that these papers be printed as a Senate document. Of course it can do no harm to have them printed in the RECORD, as the Senator from Oregon requests. I would allow the matter of their being printed as a document to be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, who can put them in convenient form and have them printed.

Mr. BACON. I think that would be a very proper course to pursue. I will suggest further to the Senator from Oregon, with his permission, that he spoke of the Panama act in general terms, without giving the date, and as there have been numerous acts with reference to the subject, possibly it might be well for him to insert the date of the act to which he refers. He can do that at his leisure.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will see that the notes are corrected to carry out what I propose. I referred to the act providing for the government of the Panama Canal Zone.

Mr. President, in reference to the request of the Senator from Georgia, I desire to say that I have not gone into this matter critically at all; but I think I have got together all the treaties affecting the particular question that I wish to have the people understand. I want them together in the RECORD, so that there will be a consecutive statement of the relations between the two Governments with respect to these treaties. I do not ask that they be published as a public document; I do not ask that they be referred to the Foreign Relations Committee in order that they may report as to whether they shall be printed as a public document, because when that committee reports here on the subject as to what they think should be included in and printed as a public document, I may want to object. I have included all that I want to have from my viewpoint, and I think I have asked for the printing of all that anybody would want to have in order to arrive at a full understanding as to these treaties.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, as I understand, this is the submission of a request for unanimous consent. Unless the matter is referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, so that the record can be made complete not only from the Senator's viewpoint but from the viewpoint of other Senators, I shall feel compelled to object to the insertion in the RECORD

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I did not hear the statement of the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I withdraw my request for unanimous consent to print the matter referred to by the Senator from Oregon as a document, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations so that they may select those documents which are necessary to make the compilation complete.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am perfectly willing for that. What I said was that unless the Senator from Oregon would consent to do that I would feel compelled to object to the request to insert all these documents in the RECORD.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I did not make a request for unanimous consent. I simply said that I desired to make a statement. If the Senator objects to having the documents printed in the RECORD, I shall take the time now or later to read all of them into the RECORD. I hope the Senator will not object. I am simply making a request that is commonly made here. The courtesy is usually extended to Senators, and I do not see why a contrary rule should be invoked against me.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon must see that, if he took the opportunity at a future time to read all these documents, in that time probably other Senators would have other documents which they would like to have printed, and they could all go into the RECORD at one and the same time. I think it would be better, if the Senator will consent, that this matter should go to the Committee on Foreign Relations, so that they can make complete the list of documents. Then we can have all of the record at one time, and Senators can get it all in one place. I hope the Senator will modify his request to that extent and include the documents he has mentioned and such other documents as bear upon the question and let the matter go to the Committee on Foreign Relations, so that they may bring in a full list of them.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I think that is rather an unusual request for a Senator to make of one of his colleagues. I have stated very frankly that I have gotten together the documents that from my viewpoint affect the relations between the United States and Great Britain.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; but the Senator gave notice at the same time——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If the Senator will pardon me until I finish. I do not pretend to say that I have gone into this matter critically and analyzed all the notes, all the correspondence, and all the treaties between the United States and Great Britain or any other of the powers, but I have taken pains to select those treaties that directly bear upon this subject—and I think I have them all. If there is anything else that should be printed, there is nothing to preclude any other Senator from making an addition to the RECORD; but I wanted the matter printed from my viewpoint, just as the Senator would want his speech to go into the RECORD from his viewpoint, without the interference of any committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This is not a speech; this is a request for the insertion in the RECORD of certain printed public documents of the Government, which are now accessible to everybody, for that matter. But the Senator gave notice at the same time he made the request that he had not made any request to print the matter as a Senate document, and that he might, when such a request was made, object to it. So, if he is going to pursue that course, I think it would be very much better for the Senator to modify his request—he can withhold his remarks and they can all go in at once—send the matter to the Foreign Relations Committee, and let them bring in these documents and such other documents at the same time as they think bear upon this controversy. Meanwhile, the Senator, as I have stated, can withhold his remarks subject to revision.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, yes.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I am surprised that any Member of this body should deem it necessary to attach conditions to the exercise of the right of the Senator from Oregon to have inserted in the RECORD such papers as he asks to have printed. If any other Senator wishes to insert other papers, it is his privilege to do so. If a technical objection be made to the insertion of the papers in the manner requested by the Senator from Oregon, he can read them into the RECORD or he can ask the Secretary to read them into the RECORD and thus needlessly consume the time of the Senate. I respectfully insist that, whatever may be the purpose or the motive or the attitude of other Senators in attempting to engraft a condition upon which a Senator exercises his right with respect to the RECORD, it does not strike me, at least, favorably. I think the Senator from Oregon should be permitted to have his request granted unconditionally. He is not asking any favor of any Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the Senator from New York is peculiarly illogical. This is not a right of a Senator. If it were a right, unanimous consent would not be necessary. The very fact that unanimous consent must be had to do it proves that it is a right of the Senate, and not a right of a Senator.

I have no objection at all to the insertion of these documents in the RECORD, but I should like them to go side by side with any other documents that may have a direct bearing upon this question. There will be no harm done, because all that is necessary is that the Senator withhold his remarks from the RECORD until the Committee on Foreign Relations can meet and see if they want to add any other documents to these. I should be glad to have the Senator modify his request that far.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I want to be as reasonable in my demands as any Senator; but I think I am entitled to the rights that are accorded to Senators generally, and that have been more than once accorded to the distinguished Senator from Mississippi. Why should a request of mine for the publication of papers which I have presented here, whether they be parts of a record or what not, be visèed by any committee of the Senate? If that is to be the rule——

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator must pardon me; I have not said anything about visèing them.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Pardon me, Mr. President. If that is going to be the rule I should like to know it, because I think I would have the same right hereafter, when the Senator from Mississippi or any other Senator introduces a paper, to appeal to the Senate to have it referred to a committee, and have it decide whether or not that is all of the given subject on either side.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. For the purpose of putting the question, the Chair will inquire as to whether he understood the Senator from Oregon correctly. His request was to print the documents in the RECORD and have the resolution referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That was the request, Mr. President. That was all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What was the request?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. My request was that the resolution should be referred to the committee in due course, and that I might have the consent of the Senate to have printed in the RECORD, along with it, not with the report of the committee, but with the resolution, the documents to which I have referred.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I have the floor, I believe.

I hope the Senator from Oregon will not misunderstand me, and I do not see any necessity for any heat of any description about a matter of this sort. I am pursuing the rules of the Senate. When a request is made in the Senate to print matter in the RECORD, it is always made as a request for unanimous consent. The Senate keeps a string upon requests of that sort, for reasons which are perfectly palpable. A man might get up and request that there be inserted as a part of the RECORD the Constitution of the United States and the Declaration of Independence. He might make any request. So it is left to other Senators to judge as to whether a request, in the form in which it is presented, is a reasonable request.

Having expressed my opinion to that effect, and having seen that it has produced some little heat upon the part of my good friend from Oregon, I withdraw the objection, because I do not want him to misunderstand me.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I wanted to suggest that we have a necessity for a public document on this question. It seems to me the purposes of the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from Oregon could be accomplished very easily by granting the request of the Senator from Oregon to insert this matter in the RECORD and then have a public document made of what the Senator from Oregon desires to have printed and such additional matter as the Committee on Foreign Relations wishes on this subject. It is a very important subject. It is one that is agitating the country. There are great demands for all of these treaties.

I would suggest that the request of the Senator from Oregon be granted, and that the Committee on Foreign Relations be permitted to have printed a public document including all these treaties and everything appertaining to this question. I should like to submit that request.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I have no objection to printing in the RECORD the matter requested by the Senator from Oregon, but I should like to know definitely what he is printing in the RECORD.

The Senator referred to several treaties. I could not understand exactly whether or not he regarded all of them as treaties. For instance, he refers to one document of which he speaks as the treaty of 1849. I do not know whether that was simply an agreement that was entered into by some one who assumed to act as the agent of the Government or whether it was adopted as a treaty. I know we had agreements which were submitted to the Senate and which were not adopted as treaties.

I should like to know definitely, and the RECORD ought to show, whether or not everything that the Senator mentions as a treaty was actually a treaty and adopted by the Senate of the United States as such. We ought to have that, so that we may have an accurate statement of what is presented.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Does the Senator desire to have me state again the papers which I desire to have printed in the RECORD?

Mr. McCUMBER. I will ask the Senator this question: Whether or not the treaty of 1849, which he says we had with Colombia—which, I believe, was New Granada at that time—was a treaty adopted by the Senate of the United States?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There was a treaty adopted in 1846, not in 1849, between New Granada and the United States. The Senator will find it in the Treaties and Conventions between the United States and Other Powers.

Mr. McCUMBER. I refer to the one of 1849 which the Senator mentioned.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The one in 1849 was sought to be negotiated between the Republic of Nicaragua and the United States. It authorized the construction of a canal across Nicaragua, and Great Britain protested against it because she claimed jurisdiction over the Mosquito coast, through which the canal was to be constructed in part. It was because of that attempted agreement between the United States and Nicaragua that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was entered into.

Mr. McCUMBER. But the instrument of 1849, as I remember, was not adopted by the Senate.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It was not consummated.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is what I wanted the RECORD to show.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. But the RECORD itself, if it is printed, will show whether it was a treaty or whether it was simply an unauthorized agreement.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not know whether the RECORD will show it as the Senator would have it printed.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I shall not undertake to have it printed as a treaty if it was not. The RECORD will show just what it was if it is printed at all.

Mr. McCUMBER. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There being no objection, the documents will be printed in the RECORD, and the joint resolution, with the accompanying documents, will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The documents referred to are as follows:

INTEROCEANIC CANAL.

CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY OF APRIL 19, 1850.

The United States of America and Her Britannic Majesty, being desirous of consolidating the relations of amity which so happily subsist between them, by setting forth and fixing in a convention their views and intentions with reference to any means of communication by ship canal which may be constructed between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by the way of the River San Juan de Nicaragua and either or both of the lakes of Nicaragua or Managua, to any port or place on the Pacific Ocean, the President of the United States has conferred full powers on John M. Clayton, Secretary of State of the United States, and Her Britannic Majesty on the Right Honorable Sir Henry Lytton Bulwer, a member of Her Majesty's most honorable privy council, knight commander of the most honorable Order of the Bath, and envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of Her Britannic Majesty to the United States, for the aforesaid purpose; and the said plenipotentiaries having exchanged their full powers, which were found to be in proper form, have agreed to the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. The Governments of the United States and Great Britain hereby declare that neither the one nor the other will ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the said ship canal; agreeing that neither will ever erect or maintain any fortifications commanding the same or in the vicinity thereof, or occupy, or fortify, or colonize, or assume, or exercise any domain over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, or any part of Central America; nor will either make use of any protection which either affords or may afford, or any alliance which either has or may have to or with any State or people, for the purpose of erecting or maintaining any such fortifications, or of occupying, fortifying, or colonizing Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, or any part of Central America, or of assuming or exercising dominion over the same; nor will the United States or Great Britain take advantage of any intimacy, or use any alliance, connection, or influence that either may possess with any State or Government through whose territory the said canal may pass, for the purpose of acquiring or holding, directly or indirectly, for the citizens or subjects of the one, any rights or advantages in regard to commerce or navigation through the said canal which shall not be offered on the same terms to the citizens or subjects of the other.

ART. 2. Vessels of the United States or Great Britain traversing the said canal shall, in case of war between the contracting parties, be exempted from blockade, detention, or capture by either of the belligerents; and this provision shall extend to such a distance from the two ends of the said canal as may hereafter be found expedient to establish.

ART. 3. In order to secure the construction of the said canal, the contracting parties engage that if any such canal shall be undertaken upon fair and equitable terms by any parties having the authority of the local Government or Governments through whose territory the same may pass, then the persons employed in making the said canal, and their property used, or to be used, for that object, shall be protected from the commencement of the said canal to its completion by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain from unjust detention, confiscation, seizure, or any violence whatsoever.

ART. 4. The contracting parties will use whatever influence they respectively exercise with any State, States, or Governments possessing or claiming to possess any jurisdiction or right over the territory which the said canal shall traverse or which shall be near the waters applicable thereto, in order to induce such States or Governments to facilitate the construction of the said canal by every means in their power. And, furthermore, the United States and Great Britain agree to use their good offices, wherever or however it may be most expedient, in order to procure the establishment of two free ports, one at each end of the said canal.

ART. 5. The contracting parties further engage, that when the said canal shall have been completed they will protect it from interruption, seizure, or unjust confiscation, and that they will guarantee the neutrality thereof, so that the said canal may forever be open and free, and the capital invested therein secure. Nevertheless, the Governments of the United States and Great Britain, in according their protection to the construction of the said canal, and guaranteeing its neutrality and security when completed, always understand that this protection and guaranty are granted conditionally, and may be withdrawn by both Governments, or either Government, if both Governments, or either Government, should deem that the persons or company undertaking or managing the same adopt or establish such regulations concerning the traffic thereupon as are contrary to the spirit and intention of this convention, either by making unfair discriminations in favor of the commerce of one of the contracting parties over the commerce of the other, or by imposing oppressive exactions or unreasonable tolls upon the passengers, vessels, goods, wares, merchandise, or other articles. Neither party, however, shall withdraw the aforesaid protection and guaranty without first giving six months' notice to the other.

ART. 6. The contracting parties in this convention engage to invite every State with which both or either have friendly intercourse to enter into stipulations with them similar to those which they have entered into with each other, to the end that all other States may share in the honor and advantage of having contributed to a work of such general interest and importance as the canal herein contemplated. And the contracting parties likewise agree that each shall enter into treaty stipulations with such of the Central American States as they may deem advisable, for the purpose of more effectually carrying out the great design of this convention, namely, that of constructing and maintaining the said canal as a ship communication between the two oceans for the benefit of mankind, on equal terms to all, and of protecting the same; and they also agree that the good offices of either shall be employed, when requested by the other, in aiding and assisting the negotiation of such treaty stipulations; and should any differences arise as to right or property over the territory through which the said canal shall pass between the States or Governments of Central America, and such differences should in any way impede or obstruct the execution of the said canal, the Governments of the United States and Great Britain will use their good offices to settle such differences in the manner best suited to promote the interests of the said canal, and to strengthen the bonds of friendship and alliance which exist between the contracting parties.

ART. 7. It being desirable that no time should be unnecessarily lost in commencing and constructing the said canal, the Governments of the United States and Great Britain determine to give their support and encouragement to such persons or company as may first offer to commence the same, with the necessary capital, the consent of the local authorities and on such principles as accord with the spirit and intention of this convention; and if any persons or company should already have, with any State through which the proposed ship canal may pass, a contract for the construction of such a canal as that specified in this convention, to the stipulations of which contract neither of the contracting parties in this convention have any just cause to object, and the said persons or company shall moreover have made preparations, and expended time, money, and trouble, on the faith of such contract, it is hereby agreed that such persons or company shall have a priority of claim over every other person, persons, or company to the protection of the Governments of the United States and Great Britain, and be allowed a year from the date of the exchange of the ratifications of this convention for concluding their arrangements, and presenting evidence of sufficient capital subscribed to accomplish the contemplated undertaking; it being understood that if, at the expiration of the aforesaid period, such persons or company be not able to commence and carry out the proposed enterprise, then the Governments of the United States and Great Britain shall be free to afford their protection to any other persons or company that shall be prepared to commence and proceed with the construction of the canal in question.

ART. 8. The Governments of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired, in entering into this convention, to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection, by treaty stipulations, to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway, across the isthmus which connects North and South America, and especially to the interoceanic communications, should the same prove to be practicable, whether by canal or railway, which are now proposed to be established by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama. In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways as are by this article specified, it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

ART. 9. The ratifications of this convention shall be exchanged at Washington within six months from this day, or sooner if possible.

In faith whereof we, the respective plenipotentiaries, have signed this convention and have hereunto affixed our seals.

Done at Washington the 19th day of April, A. D. 1850.

HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, TRANSMITTING A CONVENTION BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND GREAT BRITAIN TO FACILITATE THE CONSTRUCTION OF A SHIP CANAL TO CONNECT THE ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC OCEANS, AND TO REMOVE ANY OBJECTION WHICH MIGHT ARISE OUT OF THE CONVENTION COMMONLY CALLED THE CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY.

To the Senate:

I transmit herewith, with a view to receive the advice and consent of the Senate to its ratification, a convention this day signed by the respective plenipotentiaries of the United States and Great Britain to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, and to remove any objection which might arise out of the convention of April 19, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States.

WILLIAM MCKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, D. C., February 5, 1900.

[Amendments appear in italics.]

The United States of America and Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Empress of India, being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of April 19, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention have for that purpose appointed as their plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States, John Hay, Secretary of State of the United States of America,

And Her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain and Ireland, Empress of India, the Right Hon. Lord Pauncefote, G. C. B., G. C. M. G., Her Majesty's ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the United States;

Who, having communicated to each other their full powers, which were found to be in due and proper form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present convention, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

ART. 2. The high contracting parties, desiring to preserve and maintain the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention, which convention is hereby superseded, adopt, as the basis of such neutralization, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention between Great Britain and certain other powers, signed at Constantinople October 29, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Maritime Canal; that is to say:

1. The canal shall be free and open, in time of war as in time of peace, to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise.

2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it.

3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay, in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service.

Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of the belligerents.

4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal, within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

It is agreed, however, that none of the immediately foregoing conditions and stipulations in sections Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 of this article shall apply to measures which the United States may find it necessary to take for securing by its own forces the defense of the United States and the maintenance of public order.

6. The plant, establishments, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be part thereof, for the purposes of this convention, and in time of war as in time of peace shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

7. No fortifications shall be erected commanding the canal or the waters adjacent. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

ART. 3. (Art. 3 was stricken out by Senate.) [The high contracting parties will, immediately upon the exchange of the ratifications of this convention, bring it to the notice of the other powers and invite them to adhere to it.]

ART. 4. The present convention shall be ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by Her Britannic Majesty; and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington or at London within six months from the date hereof, or earlier if possible.

In faith whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this convention and thereunto affixed their seals.

Done in duplicate at Washington the 5th day of February, A. D. 1900.

JOHN HAY.
PAUNCEFOTE.

PROCEEDINGS ON THE HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY OF FEBRUARY 5, 1900.

IN EXECUTIVE SESSION, December 13, 1900.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the convention (Executive M, 56th Cong., 1st sess.) between the United States and Great Britain to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans.

In pursuance of the order of December 7, 1900, the Senate proceeded to vote on the amendment to the convention reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations on March 9, 1900, which was as follows:

Insert, at the end of section 5 of article 2, the following:

"It is agreed, however, that none of the immediately foregoing conditions and stipulations in sections numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 of this article shall apply to measures which the United States may find it necessary to take for securing by its own forces the defense of the United States and the maintenance of public order."

On the question to agree to the amendment it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 65, nays 17.

On motion by Mr. LODGE, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are, Messrs. Aldrich, Allen, Allison, Bacon, Baker, Bate, Berry, Burrows, Butler, Carter, Chandler, Clark, Clay, Cockrell, Culberson, Cullom, Daniel, Deboe, Depew, Dillingham, Dolliver, Elkins, Fairbanks, Foraker, Foster, Hale, Hanna, Harris, Hawley, Heitfeld, Hoar, Jones of Arkansas, Kean, Kenney, Kyle, Lodge, McBride, McComas, McLaurin, McMillan, Mallory, Martin, Nelson, Penrose, Perkins, Pettigrew, Pettus, Platt of New York, Pritchard, Proctor, Quarles, Scott, Sewell, Shoup, Spooner, Sullivan, Taliaferro, Teller, Thurston, Towne, Turley, Turner, Vest, Warren, and Wetmore.

Those who voted in the negative are, Messrs. Bard, Beveridge, Frye, Gallinger, Hansbrough, Lindsay, McCumber, McEnery, Mason, Money, Morgan, Platt of Connecticut, Rawlins, Stewart, Tillman, Wellington, and Wolcott.

So the amendment was adopted.

The following amendments to the convention were proposed:

By Mr. ELKINS: Insert, at the end of section 5 of article 2, to follow the amendment proposed by the committee and adopted in Committee of the Whole, the following:

"But nothing contained in this treaty shall be construed to prevent the United States from acquiring at any time sufficient territory, and sovereignty over the same, upon which to build, manage, operate, defend, protect, and control said canal, or for any other purposes, as the United States may deem best in its own interests."

By Mr. TILLMAN: By striking out the amendment reported by the committee and adopted in Committee of the Whole and inserting at the end of article 2 the following:

"It is agreed, however, that none of the foregoing conditions and stipulations of this article shall apply to measures which the United States may find it necessary to take for securing by its own forces the defense of the United States and the maintenance of public order."

By Mr. ALLEN: To amend article 1 by striking out the word "under," in line 13, page 2, and inserting the word "by"; strike out the words "auspices of the," at the beginning of line 14, and the words "either directly," at the end of the same line; and by striking out the following, in lines 15, 16, and 17: "or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscriptions to or purchase of stock or shares"; so that, when thus amended, the article will read as follows:

"ARTICLE 1. It is agreed that the canal may be constructed by the Government of the United States, at its own cost, and that, subject to the provisions of the present convention, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal."

By Mr. FORAKER: Amend article 2 by inserting after the word "convention," in line 24, page 2, the following: "which is hereby abrogated." Also, to amend by striking out article 3 of the proposed convention.

By Mr. BEVERIDGE: Amend by striking out article 3 of the proposed convention.

By Mr. PENROSE: Insert at the end of section 5 of article 2, to follow the amendment proposed by the committee and adopted in Committee of the Whole, the following:

"But nothing contained in this treaty shall be construed to prevent the United States from acquiring at any time sufficient territory, and sovereignty over the same, upon which to build, manage, operate, defend, fortify, protect, and control said canal, or for any other purposes, as the United States may deem best in its own interests."

By Mr. BUTLER: Amend by striking out section 7 of article 2 of the proposed convention.

DECEMBER 14, 1900.

Mr. LODGE, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported the following amendments to the said convention, which amendments were proposed by Mr. Foraker on the 13th instant:

Amend article 2 by inserting after the word "convention," in line 24, page 2, the following: "which is hereby superseded."

Also to amend by striking out article 3 of the proposed convention.

DECEMBER 15, 1900.

Mr. MASON offered the following amendment: Insert after section 7, article 2, the following:

"Provided, Nothing herein contained shall prevent the United States from protecting said canal in any way it may deem necessary if the said United States shall construct said canal at its own expense."

DECEMBER 17, 1900.

On motion by Mr. LODGE,

Ordered, That a vote be taken on the said convention and all of the pending amendments, and all amendments which may be offered, until the final vote is taken, on Thursday, December 20, 1900, at 3 o'clock p. m., without further debate after that hour.

DECEMBER 20, 1900.

Mr. LODGE, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported an amendment to the first amendment proposed by Mr. Foraker, and reported from the committee the 14th instant, as follows: After the word "which" insert the word "convention."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to by unanimous consent.

After debate,

The hour of 3 o'clock p. m. having arrived, in pursuance of the order of the 17th instant, the Senate proceeded to vote on the amended amendment proposed by Mr. Foraker, and reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to wit: In article 2, insert after the word "convention," in line 24, page 2 of the printed copy, the following: "which convention is hereby superseded."

On the question to agree thereto, it was determined in the affirmative.

On the question to agree to the further amendment proposed by Mr. Foraker, and reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to wit: Strike out article 3, on page 3 of the printed copy, it was determined in the affirmative.

Depew and Sewell in the affirmative, with Mr. Rawlins in the negative; Messrs. Platt of Connecticut and Caffrey in the affirmative, with Mr. Jones of Arkansas in the negative.

Ordered, That the Secretary lay the said resolution before the President of the United States.

On motion by Mr LODGE,

Ordered, That the convention as amended and ratified be printed for the use of the Senate, and that the injunction of secrecy be removed from the convention and the proceedings thereon, and from the votes on all amendments and on the final ratification of the convention.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, TRANSMITTING A CONVENTION BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND GREAT BRITAIN TO FACILITATE THE CONSTRUCTION OF A SHIP CANAL TO CONNECT THE ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC OCEANS, SIGNED AT WASHINGTON NOVEMBER 18, 1901.

December 4, 1901. Read; treaty read the first time and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and, together with the message, ordered to be printed in confidence for the use of the Senate.
December 9, 1901 Reported without amendment.
December 10, 1901. Injunction of secrecy removed.
December 10, 1901. Ratified; injunction of secrecy removed from proposed amendments and votes thereon, and vote of ratification.

To the Senate:

I transmit, for the advice and consent of the Senate to its ratification, a convention signed November 18, 1901, by the respective plenipotentiaries of the United States and Great Britain to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of April 19, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention.

I also inclose a report from the Secretary of State, submitting the convention for my consideration.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, December 4, 1901.

THE PRESIDENT:

I submit for your consideration and for transmission to the Senate, should you deem it proper to do so, with a view to obtaining the advice and consent of that body to its ratification, a convention signed November 18, 1901, by the respective plenipotentiaries of the United States and Great Britain to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of April 19, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention.

Respectfully submitted,

JOHN HAY.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 2, 1901.

The United States of America and His Majesty Edward the Seventh, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British dominions beyond the seas, King, and Emperor of India, being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention, have for that purpose appointed as their plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States, John Hay, Secretary of State of the United States of America;

And His Majesty Edward the Seventh, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British dominions beyond the seas, King, and Emperor of India, the Right Hon. Lord Pauncefote, G. C. B., G. C. M. G., His Majesty's ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the United States;

Who, having communicated to each other their full powers, which were found to be in due and proper form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th April, 1850.

ART. 2. It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States either directly at its own cost, or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

ART. 3. The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal; that is to say:

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service.

Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of the belligerents.

4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

6. The plant, establishments, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be part thereof for the purposes of this treaty, and in time of war, as in time of peace, shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as a part of the canal.

ART. 4. It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of international relations of the country or countries traversed by the before-mentioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

ART. 5. The present treaty shall be ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by His Britannic Majesty; and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington or at London at the earliest possible time within six months from the date hereof.

In faith whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this treaty and hereunto affixed their seals.

Done in duplicate at Washington the 18th day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and one.

Ordered, That the injunction of secrecy be removed from the proposed amendments to the said convention, from the votes thereon, and from the final vote to ratify the convention.

ART. 35. The United States of America and the Republic of New Granada, desiring to make as durable as possible the relations which are to be established between the two parties by virtue of this treaty, have declared solemnly, and do agree to the following points:

First. For the better understanding of the preceding articles, it is and has been stipulated between the high contracting parties that the citizens, vessels, and merchandise of the United States shall enjoy in the ports of New Granada, including those of the part of the Granadian territory generally denominated Isthmus of Panama, from its southernmost extremity until the boundary of Costa Rica, all the exemptions, privileges, and immunities concerning commerce and navigation which are now or may hereafter be enjoyed by Granadian citizens, their vessels, and merchandise; and that this equality of favors shall be made to extend to the passengers, correspondence, and merchandise of the United States in their transit across the said territory from one sea to the other. The Government of New Granada guarantees to the Government of the United States that the right of way or transit across the Isthmus of Panama upon any modes of communication that now exist or that may be hereafter constructed shall be open and free to the Government and citizens of the United States and for the transportation of any articles of produce, manufactures, or merchandise of lawful commerce belonging to the citizens of the United States; that no other tolls or charges shall be levied or collected upon the citizens of the United States, or their said merchandise thus passing over any road or canal that may be made by the Government of New Granada, or by the authority of the same than is under like circumstances levied upon and collected from the Granadian citizens; that any lawful produce, manufactures, or merchandise belonging to citizens of the United States thus passing from one sea to the other in either direction for the purpose of exportation to any other foreign country shall not be liable to any import duties whatever; or, having paid such duties, they shall be entitled to drawback upon their exportation; nor shall the citizens of the United States be liable to any duties, tolls, or charges of any kind to which native citizens are not subjected for thus passing the said Isthmus. And, in order to secure to themselves the tranquil and constant enjoyment of these advantages, and as an especial compensation for the said advantages, and for the favors they have acquired by the fourth, fifth, and sixth articles of this treaty, the United States guarantee, positively and efficaciously, to New Granada, by the present stipulation, the perfect neutrality of the before-mentioned Isthmus, with the view that the free transit from the one to the other sea may not be interrupted or embarrassed in any future time while this treaty exists; and in consequence the United States also guarantee in the same manner the rights of sovereignty and property which New Granada has and possesses over said territory.

Second. The present treaty shall remain in full force and vigor for the term of 20 years from the day of the exchange of the ratification; and from the same day the treaty that was concluded between the United States and Colombia, on the 13th of October, 1824, shall cease to have effect, notwithstanding what was disposed in the first point of its thirty-first article.

Third. Notwithstanding the foregoing, if neither party notifies to the other its intention of reforming any of or all the articles of this treaty 12 months before the expiration of the 20 years stipulated above, the said treaty shall continue binding on both parties beyond the said 20 years until 12 months from the time that one of the parties notifies its intention of proceeding to a reform.

Fourth. If any one or more of the citizens of either party shall infringe any of the articles of this treaty, such citizens shall be held personally responsible for the same, and the harmony and good correspondence between the nations shall not be interrupted thereby, each party engaging in no way to protect the offender or sanction such violation.

Fifth. If unfortunately any of the articles contained in this treaty should be violated and infringed in any way whatever, it is expressly stipulated that neither of the two contracting parties shall ordain or authorize any acts of reprisal, nor shall declare war against the other on complaints of injuries or damages until the said party considering itself offended shall have laid before the other a statement of such injuries or damages, verified by competent proofs, demanding justice and satisfaction, and the same shall have been denied, in violation of the laws and of international right.

Sixth. Any special or remarkable advantage that one or the other power may enjoy from the foregoing stipulation are and ought to be always understood in virtue and as in compensation of the obligations they have just contracted and which have been specified in the first number of this article.

An act to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans.

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to acquire, for and on behalf of the United States, at a cost not exceeding $40,000,000 the rights, privileges, franchises, concessions, grants of lands, right of way, unfinished work, plants, and other property, real, personal, and mixed, of every name and nature, owned by the New Panama Canal Co., of France, on the Isthmus of Panama, and all its maps, plans, drawings, records on the Isthmus of Panama and in Paris, including all the capital stock, not less, however, than 68,863 shares of the Panama Railroad Co., owned by or held for the use of said canal company, provided a satisfactory title to all of said property can be obtained.

SEC. 2. That the President is hereby authorized to acquire from the Republic of Colombia, for and on behalf of the United States, upon such terms as he may deem reasonable, perpetual control of a strip of land, the territory of the Republic of Colombia, not less than 6 miles in width, extending from the Caribbean Sea to the Pacific Ocean, and the right to use and dispose of the waters thereon, and to excavate, construct, and to perpetually maintain, operate, and protect thereon a canal, of such depth and capacity as will afford convenient passage of ships of the greatest tonnage and draft now in use, from the Caribbean Sea to the Pacific Ocean, which control shall include the right to perpetually maintain and operate the Panama Railroad, if the ownership thereof, or a controlling interest therein, shall have been acquired by the United States, and also jurisdiction over said strip and the ports at the ends thereof to make such police and sanitary rules and regulations as shall be necessary to preserve order and preserve the public health thereon, and to establish such judicial tribunals as may be agreed upon thereon as may be necessary to enforce such rules and regulations.

The President may acquire such additional territory and rights from Colombia as in his judgment will facilitate the general purpose hereof.

SEC. 3. That when the President shall have arranged to secure a satisfactory title to the property of the New Panama Canal Co., as provided in section 1 hereof, and shall have obtained by treaty control of the necessary territory from the Republic of Colombia, as provided in section two hereof, he is authorized to pay for the property of the New Panama Canal Co. $40,000,000 and to the Republic of Colombia such sum as shall have been agreed upon, and a sum sufficient for both said purposes is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be paid on warrant or warrants drawn by the President.

The President shall then, through the Isthmian Canal Commission, hereinafter authorized, cause to be excavated, constructed, and completed, utilizing to that end as far as practicable the work heretofore done by the New Panama Canal Co., of France, and its predecessor company, a ship canal from the Caribbean Sea to the Pacific Ocean. Such canal shall be of sufficient capacity and depth as shall afford convenient passage for vessels of the largest tonnage and greatest draft now in use, and such as may be reasonably anticipated, and shall be supplied with all necessary locks and other appliances to meet the necessities of vessels passing through the same from ocean to ocean; and he shall also cause to be constructed such safe and commodious harbors at the termini of said canal, and make such provisions for defense as may be necessary for the safety and protection of said canal and harbors. That the President is authorized for the purposes aforesaid to employ such persons as he may deem necessary, and to fix their compensation.

SEC. 4. That should the President be unable to obtain for the United States a satisfactory title to the property of the New Panama Canal Co. and the control of the necessary territory of the Republic of Colombia and the rights mentioned in sections 1 and 2 of this act, within a reasonable time and upon reasonable terms, then the President, having first obtained for the United States perpetual control by treaty of the necessary territory from Costa Rica and Nicaragua, upon terms which he may consider reasonable, for the construction, perpetual maintenance, operation, and protection of a canal connecting the Caribbean Sea with the Pacific Ocean by what is commonly known as the Nicaragua route, shall through the said Isthmian Canal Commission cause to be excavated and constructed a ship canal and waterway from a point on the shore of the Caribbean Sea near Greytown, by way of Lake Nicaragua, to a point near Brito on the Pacific Ocean. Said canal shall be of sufficient capacity and depth to afford convenient passage for vessels of the largest tonnage and greatest draft now in use, and such as may be reasonably anticipated, and shall be supplied with all necessary locks and other appliances to meet the necessities of vessels passing through the same from ocean to ocean; and he shall also construct such safe and commodious harbors at the termini of said canal as shall be necessary for the safe and convenient use thereof, and shall make such provisions for defense as may be necessary for the safety and protection of said harbors and canal; and such sum or sums of money as may be agreed upon by such treaty as compensation to be paid to Nicaragua and Costa Rica for the concessions and rights hereunder provided to be acquired by the United States, are hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be paid on warrant or warrants drawn by the President.

The President shall cause the said Isthmian Canal Commission to make such surveys as may be necessary for said canal and harbors to be made, and in making such surveys and in the construction of said canal may employ such persons as he may deem necessary, and may fix their compensation.

In the excavation and construction of said canal the San Juan River and Lake Nicaragua, or such parts of each as may be made available, shall be used.

SEC. 5. That the sum of $10,000,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, toward the project herein contemplated by either route so selected.

And the President is hereby authorized to cause to be entered into such contract or contracts as may be deemed necessary for the proper excavation, construction, completion, and defense of said canal, harbors, and defenses, by the route finally determined upon under the provisions of this act. Appropriations therefor shall from time to time be hereafter made, not to exceed in the aggregate the additional sum of $135,000,000 should the Panama route be adopted, or $180,000,000 should the Nicaragua route be adopted.

SEC. 6. That in any agreement with the Republic of Colombia, or with the States of Nicaragua and Costa Rica, the President is authorized to guarantee to said Republic or to said States the use of said canal and harbors, upon such terms as may be agreed upon, for all vessels owned by said States or by citizens thereof.

SEC. 7. That to enable the President to construct the canal and works appurtenant thereto as provided in this act, there is hereby created the Isthmian Canal Commission, the same to be composed of seven members, who shall be nominated and appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall serve until the completion of said canal unless sooner removed by the President, and one of whom shall be named as the chairman of said commission. Of the seven members of said commission at least four of them shall be persons learned and skilled in the science of engineering, and of the four at least one shall be an officer of the United States Army, and at least one other shall be an officer of the United States Navy, the said officers, respectively, being either upon the active or the retired list of the Army or of the Navy. Said commissioners shall each receive such compensation as the President shall prescribe until the same shall have been otherwise fixed by the Congress. In addition to the members of said Isthmian Canal Commission, the President is hereby authorized through said commission to employ in said service any of the engineers of the United States Army at his discretion, and likewise to employ any engineers in civil life, at his discretion, and any other persons necessary for the proper and expeditious prosecution of said work. The compensation of all such engineers and other persons employed under this act shall be fixed by said commission, subject to the approval of the President. The official salary of any officer appointed or employed under this act shall be deducted from the amount of salary or compensation provided by or which shall be fixed under the terms of this act. Said commission shall in all matters be subject to the direction and control of the President, and shall make to the President annually and at such other periods as may be required, either by law or by the order of the President, full and complete reports of all their actings and doings and of all moneys received and expended in the construction of said work and in the performance of their duties in connection therewith, which said reports shall be by the President transmitted to Congress. And the said commission shall furthermore give to Congress, or either House of Congress, such information as may at any time be required either by act of Congress or by the order of either House of Congress. The President shall cause to be provided and assigned for the use of the commission such offices as may, with the suitable equipment of the same, be necessary and proper, in his discretion, for the proper discharge of the duties thereof.

SEC. 8. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to borrow on the credit of the United States from time to time, as the proceeds may be required to defray expenditures authorized by this act (such proceeds when received to be used only for the purpose of meeting such expenditures), the sum of $130,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, and to prepare and issue therefor coupon or registered bonds of the United States in such form as he may prescribe, and in denominations of $20 or some multiple of that sum, redeemable in gold coin at the pleasure of the United States after 10 years from the date of their issue, and payable 30 years from such date, and bearing interest payable quarterly in gold coin at the rate of 2 per cent per annum; and the bonds herein authorized shall be exempt from all taxes or duties of the United States, as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority: Provided, That said bonds may be disposed of by the Secretary of the Treasury at not less than par, under such regulations as he may prescribe, giving to all citizens of the United States an equal opportunity to subscribe therefor, but no commissions shall be allowed or paid thereon; and a sum not exceeding one-tenth of 1 per cent of the amount of the bonds herein authorized is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the expense of preparing, advertising, and issuing the same.

Approved, June 28, 1902.

PANAMA—SHIP CANAL.

Convention between the United States and the Republic of Panama for the construction of a ship canal to connect the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans.

Signed at Washington, November 18, 1903.
Ratification advised by the Senate, February 23, 1904.
Ratified by the President, February 25, 1904.
Ratified by Panama, December 2, 1903.
Ratifications exchanged at Washington, February 26, 1904.
Proclaimed, February 26, 1904.

A proclamation by the President of the United States of America.

Whereas a convention between the United States of America and the Republic of Panama to insure the construction of a ship canal across the Isthmus of Panama to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans was concluded and signed by their respective plenipotentiaries at Washington, on the 18th day of November, 1903, the original of which convention, being in the English language, is word for word as follows:

ISTHMIAN CANAL CONVENTION.

The United States of America and the Republic of Panama being desirous to insure the construction of a ship canal across the Isthmus of Panama to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, and the Congress of the United States of America having passed an act approved June 28, 1902, in furtherance of that object, by which the President of the United States is authorized to acquire within a reasonable time the control of the necessary territory of the Republic of Colombia, and the sovereignty of such territory being actually vested in the Republic of Panama, the high contracting parties have resolved for that purpose to conclude a convention and have accordingly appointed as their plenipotentiaries,

The President of the United States of America, John Hay, Secretary of State, and

The Government of the Republic of Panama, Philippe Bunau-Varilla, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the Republic of Panama, thereunto specially empowered by said Government, who after communicating with each other their respective full powers, found to be in good and due form, have agreed upon the concluded the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. The United States guarantees and will maintain the independence of the Republic of Panama.

ART. 2. The Republic of Panama grants to the United States in perpetuity the use, occupation, and control of a zone of land and land under water for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of said canal of the width of 10 miles extending to the distance of 5 miles on each side of the center line of the route of the canal to be constructed; the said zone beginning in the Caribbean Sea 3 marine miles from mean low water mark and extending to and across the Isthmus of Panama into the Pacific Ocean to a distance of 3 marine miles from mean low water mark with the proviso that the cities of Panama and Colon and the harbors adjacent to said cities, which are included within the boundaries of the zone above described, shall not be included within this grant. The Republic of Panama further grants to the United States in perpetuity the use, occupation, and control of any other lands and waters outside of the zone above described which may be necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the said canal or of any auxiliary canals or other works necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the said enterprise.

The Republic of Panama further grants in like manner to the United States in perpetuity all islands within the limits of the zone above described and in addition thereto the group of small islands in the Bay of Panama, named Perico, Naos, Culebra, and Flamenco.

ART. 3. The Republic of Panama grants to the United States all the rights, power, and authority within the zone mentioned and described in article 2 of this agreement and within the limits of all auxiliary lands and waters mentioned and described in said article 2 which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the territory within which said lands and waters are located to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power, or authority.

ART. 4. As rights subsidiary to the above grants the Republic of Panama grants in perpetuity to the United States the right to use the rivers, streams, lakes, and other bodies of water within its limits for navigation, the supply of water or water power or other purposes, so far as the use of said rivers, streams, lakes, and bodies of water and the waters thereof may be necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the said canal.

ART. 5. The Republic of Panama grants to the United States in perpetuity a monopoly for the construction, maintenance, and operation of any system of communication by means of canal or railroad across its territory between the Caribbean Sea and the Pacific Ocean.

ART. 6. The grants herein contained shall in no manner invalidate the titles or rights of private land holders or owners of private property in the said zone or in or to any of the lands or waters granted to the United States by the provisions of any article of this treaty, nor shall they interfere with the rights of way over the public roads passing through the said zone or over any of the said lands or waters unless said rights of way or private rights shall conflict with rights herein granted to the United States in which case the rights of the United States shall be superior. All damages caused to the owners of private lands or private property of any kind by reason of the grants contained in this treaty or by reason of the operations of the United States, its agents or employees, or by reason of the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the said canal or of the works of sanitation and protection herein provided for, shall be appraised and settled by a joint commission appointed by the Governments of the United States and the Republic of Panama, whose decisions as to such damages shall be final and whose awards as to such damages shall be paid solely by the United States. No part of the work on said canal or the Panama Railroad or on any auxiliary works relating thereto and authorized by the terms of this treaty shall be prevented, delayed, or impeded by or pending such proceedings to ascertain such damages. The appraisal of said private lands and private property and the assessment of damages to them shall be based upon their value before the date of this convention.

ART. 7. The Republic of Panama grants to the United States within the limits of the cities of Panama and Colon and their adjacent harbors and within the territory adjacent thereto the right to acquire by purchase or by the exercise of the right of eminent domain, any lands, buildings, water rights, or other properties necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, and protection of the canal and of any works of sanitation, such as the collection and disposition of sewage and the distribution of water in the said cities of Panama and Colon, which, in the discretion of the United States may be necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the said canal and railroad. All such works of sanitation, collection, and disposition of sewage and distribution of water in the cities of Panama and Colon shall be made at the expense of the United States, and the Government of the United States, its agents or nominees shall be authorized to impose and collect water rates and sewerage rates which shall be sufficient to provide for the payment of interest and the amortization of the principal of the cost of said works within a period of 50 years and upon the expiration of said term of 50 years the system of sewers and water works shall revert to and become the properties of the cities of Panama and Colon, respectively, and the use of the water shall be free to the inhabitants of Panama and Colon, except to the extent that water rates may be necessary for the operation and maintenance of said system of sewers and water.

The Republic of Panama agrees that the cities of Panama and Colon shall comply in perpetuity with the sanitary ordinances whether of a preventive or curative character prescribed by the United States and in case the Government of Panama is unable or fails in its duty to enforce this compliance by the cities of Panama and Colon with the sanitary ordinances of the United States the Republic of Panama grants to the United States the right and authority to enforce the same.

The same right and authority are granted to the United States for the maintenance of public order in the cities of Panama and Colon and the territories and harbors adjacent thereto in case the Republic of Panama should not be, in the judgment of the United States, able to maintain such order.

ART. 8. The Republic of Panama grants to the United States all rights which it now has or hereafter may acquire to the property of the New Panama Canal Co. and the Panama Railroad Co. as a result of the transfer of sovereignty from the Republic of Colombia to the Republic of Panama over the Isthmus of Panama and authorizes the New Panama Canal Co. to sell and transfer to the United States its rights, privileges, properties, and concessions as well as the Panama Railroad and all the shares or part of the shares of that company; but the public lands situated outside of the zone described in Article II of this treaty now included in the concessions to both said enterprises and not required in the construction or operation of the canal shall revert to the Republic of Panama except any property now owned by or in the possession of said companies within Panama or Colon or the ports or terminals thereof.

ART. 9. The United States agrees that the ports at either entrance of the canal and the waters thereof and the Republic of Panama agrees that the towns of Panama and Colon shall be free for all time, so that there shall not be imposed or collected customhouse tolls, tonnage, anchorage, lighthouse, wharf, pilot, or quarantine dues, or any other charges or taxes of any kind upon any vessel using or passing through the canal or belonging to or employed by the United States, directly or indirectly, in connection with the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the main canal or auxiliary works, or upon the cargo, officers, crew, or passengers of any such vessels, except such tolls and charges as may be imposed by the United States for the use of the canal and other works, and except tolls and charges imposed by the Republic of Panama upon merchandise destined to be introduced for the consumption of the rest of the Republic of Panama, and upon vessels touching at the ports of Colon and Panama and which do not cross the canal.

The Government of the Republic of Panama shall have the right to establish in such ports and in the towns of Panama and Colon such houses and guards as it may deem necessary to collect duties on importations destined to other portions of Panama and to prevent contraband trade. The United States shall have the right to make use of the towns and harbors of Panama and Colon as places of anchorage, and for making repairs, for loading, unloading, depositing, or transshipping cargoes either in transit or destined for the service of the canal and for other works pertaining to the canal.

ART. 10. The Republic of Panama agrees that there shall not be imposed any taxes, national, municipal, departmental, or of any other class, upon the canal, the railways and auxiliary works, tugs, and other vessels employed in the service of the canal, storehouses, workshops, offices, quarters for laborers, factories of all kinds, warehouses, wharves, machinery and other works, property, and effects appertaining to the canal or railroad and auxiliary works, or their officers or employees, situated within the cities of Panama and Colon, and that there shall not be imposed contributions or charges of a personal character of any kind upon officers, employees, laborers, and other individuals in the service of the canal and railroad and auxiliary works.

ART. 11. The United States agrees that the official dispatches of the Government of the Republic of Panama shall be transmitted over any telegraph and telephone lines established for canal purposes and used for public and private business at rates not higher than those required from officials in the service of the United States.

ART. 12. The Government of the Republic of Panama shall permit the immigration and free access to the lands and workshops of the canal and its auxiliary works of all employees and workmen of whatever nationality under contract to work upon or seeking employment upon or in anywise connected with the said canal and its auxiliary works, with their respective families, and all such persons shall be free and exempt from the military service of the Republic of Panama.

ART. 13. The United States may import at any time into the said zone and auxiliary lands, free of custom duties, imposts, taxes, or other charges, and without any restrictions, any and all vessels, dredges, engines, cars, machinery, tools, explosives, materials, supplies, and other articles necessary and convenient in the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the canal and auxiliary works, and all provisions, medicines, clothing, supplies, and other things necessary and convenient for the officers, employees, workmen, and laborers in the service and employ of the United States and for their families. If any such articles are disposed of for use outside of the zone and auxiliary lands granted to the United States and within the territory of the Republic, they shall be subject to the same import or other duties as like articles imported under the laws of the Republic of Panama.

ART. 14. As the price of compensation for the rights, powers, and privileges granted in this convention by the Republic of Panama to the United States, the Government of the United States agrees to pay to the Republic of Panama the sum of $10,000,000 in gold coin of the United States on the exchange of the ratification of this convention and also an annular payment during the life of this convention of $250,000 in like gold coin, beginning nine years after the date aforesaid.

The provisions of this article shall be in addition to all other benefits assured to the Republic of Panama under this convention.

But no delay or difference of opinion under this article or any other provisions of this treaty shall affect or interrupt the full operation and effect of this convention in all other respects.

ART. 15. The joint commission referred to in article 6 shall be established as follows:

The President of the United States shall nominate two persons and the President of the Republic of Panama shall nominate two persons and they shall proceed to a decision; but in case of disagreement of the commission (by reason of their being equally divided in conclusion) an umpire shall be appointed by the two Governments who shall render the decision. In the event of the death, absence, or incapacity of a commissioner or umpire, or of his omitting, declining, or ceasing to act, his place shall be filled by the appointment of another person in the manner above indicated. All decisions by a majority of the commission or by the umpire shall be final.

ART. 16. The two Governments shall make adequate provisions by future agreement for the pursuit, capture, imprisonment, detention, and delivery within said zone and auxiliary lands to the authorities of the Republic of Panama of persons charged with the commitment of crimes, felonies, or misdemeanors without said zone and for the pursuit, capture, imprisonment, detention, and delivery without said zone to the authorities of the United States of persons charged with the commitment of crimes, felonies, and misdemeanors within said zone and auxiliary lands.

ART. 17. The Republic of Panama grants to the United States the use of all the ports of the Republic open to commerce as places of refuge for any vessels employed in the canal enterprise, and for all vessels passing or bound to pass through the canal which may be in distress and be driven to seek refuge in said ports. Such vessels shall be exempt from anchorage and tonnage dues on the part of the Republic of Panama.

ART. 18. The canal, when constructed, and the entrances thereto shall be neutral in perpetuity, and shall be opened upon the terms provided for by section 1 of article 3 of, and in conformity with all the stipulations of, the treaty entered into by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain on November 18, 1901.

ART. 19. The Government of the Republic of Panama shall have the right to transport over the canal its vessels and its troops and munitions of war in such vessels at all times without paying charges of any kind. The exemption is to be extended to the auxiliary railway for the transportation of persons in the service of the Republic of Panama, or of the police force charged with the preservation of public order outside of said zone, as well as to their baggage, munitions of war, and supplies.

ART. 20. If by virtue of any existing treaty in relation to the territory of the Isthmus of Panama, whereof the obligations shall descend or be assumed by the Republic of Panama, there may be any privilege or concession in favor of the Government or the citizens and subjects of a third power relative to an interoceanic means of communication which in any of its terms may be incompatible with the terms of the present convention, the Republic of Panama agrees to cancel or modify such treaty in due form, for which purpose it shall give to the said third power the requisite notification within the term of four months from the date of the present convention, and in case the existing treaty contains no clause permitting its modifications or annulment, the Republic of Panama agrees to procure its modification or annulment in such form that there shall not exist any conflict with the stipulations of the present convention.

ART. 21. The rights and privileges granted by the Republic of Panama to the United States in the preceding articles are understood to be free of all anterior debts, liens, trusts, or liabilities, or concessions or privileges to other Governments, corporations, syndicates, or individuals, and consequently if there should arise any claims on account of the present concessions and privileges or otherwise, the claimants shall resort to the Government of the Republic of Panama and not to the United States for any indemnity or compromise which may be required.

ART. 22. The Republic of Panama renounces and grants to the United States the participation to which it might be entitled in the future earnings of the canal under article 15 of the concessionary contract with Lucien N. B. Wyse now owned by the New Panama Canal Co., and any and all other rights or claims of a pecuniary nature arising under or relating to said concession, or arising under or relating to the concessions to the Panama Railroad Co. or any extension or modification thereof; and it likewise renounces, confirms, and grants to the United States, now and hereafter, all the rights and property reserved in the said concessions which otherwise would belong to Panama at or before the expiration of the terms of 99 years of the concessions granted to or held by the above-mentioned party and companies, and all right, title, and interest which it now has or may hereafter have in and to the lands, canal, works, property, and rights held by the said companies under said concessions or otherwise, and acquired or to be acquired by the United States from or through the New Panama Canal Co., including any property and rights which might or may in the future, either by lapse of time, forfeiture, or otherwise, revert to the Republic of Panama under any contracts or concessions with said Wyse, the Universal Panama Canal Co., the Panama Railroad Co., and the New Panama Canal Co.

The aforesaid rights and property shall be and are free and released from any present or reversionary interest in or claims of Panama and the title of the United States thereto upon consummation of the contemplated purchase by the United States from the New Panama Canal Co., shall be absolute, so far as concerns the Republic of Panama, excepting always the rights of the Republic specifically secured under this treaty.

ART. 23. If it should become necessary at any time to employ armed forces for the safety or protection of the canal, or of the ships that make use of the same, or the railways and auxiliary works, the United States shall have the right, at all times and in its discretion, to use its police and its land and naval forces or to establish fortifications for these purposes.

ART. 24. No change either in the Government or in the laws and treaties of the Republic of Panama shall, without the consent of the United States, affect any right of the United States under the present convention, or under any treaty stipulation between the two countries that now exists or may hereafter exist touching the subject matter of this convention.

If the Republic of Panama shall hereafter enter as a constituent into any other Government or into any union or confederation of states, so as to merge her sovereignty or independence in such Government, union, or confederation, the rights of the United States under this convention shall not be in any respect lessened or impaired.

ART. 25. For the better performance of the engagements of this convention and to the end of the efficient protection of the canal and the preservation of its neutrality, the Government of the Republic of Panama will sell or lease to the United States lands adequate and necessary for naval or coaling stations on the Pacific coast and on the western Caribbean coast of the Republic at certain points to be agreed upon with the President of the United States.

ART. 26. This convention when signed by the plenipotentiaries of the contracting parties shall be ratified by the respective Governments and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington at the earliest date possible.

In faith whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the present convention in duplicate and have hereunto affixed their respective seals.

Done at the city of Washington the 18th day of November, A. D. 1903.

JOHN HAY. [SEAL.]
P. BUNAU VARILLA. [SEAL.]

And whereas the said convention has been duly ratified on both parts, and the ratification of the two Governments were exchanged in the city of Washington, on the 26th day of February, 1904;

Now, therefore, be it known that I, Theodore Roosevelt, President of the United States of America, have caused the said convention to be made public, to the end that the same and every article and clause thereof may be observed and fulfilled with good faith by the United States and the citizens thereof.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States of America to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this 26th day of February, A. D. 1904, and of the independence of the United States the one hundred and twenty-eighth.

[SEAL.] THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

By the President:
JOHN HAY, Secretary of State.

LEGACIÓN DE LA REPÚBLICA DE
PANAMÁ EN WASHINGTON,
Washington, D. C., February 18, 1904.

His Excellency JOHN HAY,
Secretary of State, etc., Washington, D. C.

SIR: I have the honor of acknowledging the receipt of your communication, No. 23, of January 30, 1904, in which you express to me certain observations about the translation of the treaty of November 18, 1903, contained in the decree ratifying the treaty.

I accept in the name of the Government of the Republic what you propose in said letter, which reads as follows:

"SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 9th instant, transmitting a copy of the decree ratifying the treaty of November 18, 1903, and containing its text in the Spanish language.

"In reply to your request to be notified 'in case the translation is in every respect satisfactory,' I have the honor to invite your attention to a few omissions, as follows:

"1. In article 8, line 4, of page 6 of the translation, the words 'á la República de Panamá,' after 'traspaso de soberanía de la República de Colombia,' should be added.

"2. In the same article, last line of the article, the word 'ó' should be inserted between 'puertos' and 'terminales.'

"3. In article 9, last line but two in the second paragraph of the article, on page 7, the words 'cargar, descargar, almacenar y,' omitted from the English text, should come before the words 'trasbordar cargas.'

"4. In article 22, page 11, line 2 of the last paragraph, the words 'present or' in the English text have been omitted, and should be represented by the words 'ó actuales' placed in the Spanish text after the words 'derechos de reversión.'

"In regard to the exact equivalence of words in both languages, I have to indicate the following changes which appear to be necessary:

"1. In article 7, line 2 of page 5, the word 'puertos' should be used instead of 'bahías' for the English word 'harbors.'

"2. In article 9, line 4 of the article, page 6 of the copy submitted by you, the words 'customhouse tolls' have been rendered into 'derechos de aduana,' which are understood to mean duties collected on merchandise entered for actual consumption in the country. It is believed that the word 'peajes' would be preferable.

"3. In article 13, line 2 of page 8, the English word 'lands' has been translated 'obras,' for which 'terrenos' should obviously be substituted.

"There are a number of other words, the accurate meaning of which may give rise to a difference of interpretation, but inasmuch as there could be no other difficulty in connection with the said words, and in view of the fact that the Spanish text has already been formally approved by your Government, the necessity of making further changes therein will be obviated by your official statement that the English text shall prevail in case of such difference of interpretation.

"Accept, Mr. Minister, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration.

"FRANCIS B. LOOMIS,
"Acting Secretary."

I am, sir, with great respect, your very obedient servant,
P. BUNAU VARILLA.

DECRETO NÚMERO 24 DE 1903 (DE 2 DE DICIEMBRE), POR EL CUAL SE APRUEBA UN TRATADO CON LOS ESTADOS UNIDOS DE NORTE AMÉRICA.

La junta de gobierno provisional de la República de Panamá,

Por cuanto se ha celebrado entre el Enviado Extraordinario y Ministro Plenipotenciario de la República acreditado ante el Gobierno de los Estados Unidos de América, y el Señor Secretario de Estado de aquella Nación un tratado que copiado á la letra dice así:

CONVENCIÓN DE CANAL Á TRAVÉS DEL ISTMO.

Los Estados Unidos de América y la República de Panamá, deseosos de asegurar la construcción de un Canal para naves á través del Istmo de Panamá para comunicar los océanos Atlántico y Pacífico y habiendo expedido el Congreso de los Estados Unidos de América una ley aprobada el 28 de Junio de 1902 en prosecución de aquel objeto por la cual se autoriza al Presidente de los Estados Unidos para adquirir de la República de Colombia dentro de un plazo razonable el control del territorio necesario y perteneciendo actualmente la soberanía de ese territorio á la República de Panamá, las altas partes contratantes han resuelto con ese propósito concluir una convención y han designado de conformidad como sus Plenipotenciarios—

El Gobierno de la República de Panamá á Philippe Bunau-Varilla, Enviado Extraordinario y Ministro Plenipotenciario de la República de Panamá, para ello especialmente facultado por dicho Gobierno, quienes después de haberse comunicado recíprocamente sus respectivos plenos poderes y de haberlos hayado en buena y debida forma, han convenido y concluído los siguientes artículos:

ARTÍCULO 1. Los Estados Unidos garantizan y mantendrán la Independencia de la República de Panamá.

ART. 2. La República de Panamá concede á perpetuidad á los Estados Unidos el uso, ocupación y control de una zona de tierra y de tierra cubierta por agua, para la construcción, conservación, servicio, sanidad y protección de dicho Canal, zona de una anchura de diez millas que se extenderá cinco millas á cada lado de la línea central del Canal que se va á construir, principiando dicha zona á tres millas de la línea media de la baja mar en el mar Caribe, extendiéndose á través del Istmo y terminando en el océano Pacífico á tres millas de distancia de la línea media de la baja mar, con la condición de que las ciudades de Panamá y Colón y los puertos adyacentes á dichas ciudades que están incluídos dentro de los límites de la zona descrita no quedarán comprendidos en esta concesión. La República de Panamá concede además á perpetuidad á los Estados Unidos el uso, ocupación y control de otras tierras y aguas fuera de la zona arriba descrita que puedan ser necesarias y convenientes para la construcción, conservación, servicio, sanidad y protección de dicha empresa.

La República de Panamá concede también del mismo modo y á perpetuidad á los Estados Unidos todas las islas que se encuentren dentro de los límites de la zona ya descrita y además el grupo de pequeñas islas situadas en la bahía de Panamá y conocidas con los nombres de Naos, Perico, Culebra y Flamenco.

ART. 3. La República de Panamá concede á los Estados Unidos todos los derechos, poder y autoridad en la zona mencionada y descrita en el Artículo II de este convenio y dentro de los límites de todas las tierras y aguas auxiliares mencionadas y descritas en dicho Artículo II las cuales poseerán y ejercitarán los Estados Unidos como si fuesen soberanos del territorio en que dichas tierras y aguas se encuentran situadas, con entera exclusión de la República de Panamá en el ejercicio de tales derechos soberanos, poder ó autoridad.

ART. 4. Como derechos subsidiarios de las concesiones que anteceden la República de Panamá concede á perpetuidad á los Estados Unidos el derecho de usar los ríos, riachuelos, lagos y otras aguas dentro de sus límites para la navegación, provisión de agua ó agua para fuerza motriz ú otros objetos, en cuanto el uso de tales ríos, riachuelos y aguas puedan ser necesarios y convenientes para la construcción, conservación, servicio, sanidad y protección del dicho canal.

ART. 5. La República de Panamá concede á los Estados Unidos á perpetuidad el monopolio para la construcción, conservación y servicio de cualquier sistema de comunicación por medio de canal ó ferrocarril á través de su territorio entre el mar Caribe y el océano Pacífico.

ART. 6. Las concesiones que aquí se expresan de ninguna manera invalidarán los títulos de derecho de los ocupantes de tierras ó dueños de propiedad particular en la referida zona, ó en cualquiera de las tierras ó aguas concedidas á los Estados Unidos según las provisiones de cualquier artículo de este tratado, ni tampoco se opondrán á los derechos de tránsito por las vías públicas que pasen á través de la referida zona ó por cualquiera de dichas tierras ó aguas á menos que esos derechos de tránsito ó derechos particulares se hallen en conflicto con los derechos que aquí se le conceden á los Estados Unidos, caso en el cual los derechos de los Estados Unidos serán de mayor valor. Todos los daños que se causen á los dueños de tierras ó de propiedades particulares de cualquiera clase que sean, á causa de las concesiones que contiene este tratado ó por causa de las obras que se efectúen por los Estados Unidos, por sus agentes ó sus empleados, ó debido á la construcción, conservación, servicio, sanidad y protección de dicho canal ó de las obras de saneamiento y protección de que aquí se hace mérito, serán valorados y arreglados por una comisión mixta que se nombrará por los Gobiernos de los Estados Unidos y de la República de Panamá, y cuyas decisiones con respecto á daños serán finales, y cuyos avalúos serán cubiertos solamente por los Estados Unidos. Ninguna parte de los trabajos del Canal ó del Ferrocarril de Panamá, ni ninguna de las obras auxiliares que á éstos se refieran y autorizadas por los términos de este tratado, será impedida, demorada ni estorbada mientras estén pendientes los procedimientos para averiguar dichos daños. La apreciación de esas tierras ó propiedades particulares y el avalúo de los daños á ellas causados tendrán por base el valor que tenían ántes de celebrarse este tratado.

ART. 7. La República de Panamá concede á los Estados Unidos, dentro de los límites de las ciudades de Panamá y Colón y de sus bahías y territorios adyacentes, el derecho de adquirir por compra ó en ejercicio del derecho de dominio eminente, las tierras, edificios, derechos de aguas ú otras propiedades necesarias y convenientes para la construcción, conservación, servicio y protección del Canal ú otras obras de saneamiento tales como el recogimiento y disposición de desperdicios y la distribución de agua en las referidas ciudades de Panamá y Colón, y que á juicio de los Estados Unidos sean necesarios y convenientes para la construccion, conservación, servicio, saneamiento y protección de dicho Canal y del Ferrocarril. Todas las obras de sanidad, colección y distribución de desperdicios así como la distribución de aguas en las ciudades de Panamá y Colón se ejecutarán por los Estados Unidos y á su costa, y el Gobierno de los Estados Unidos, sus agentes y representantes tendrán autoridad para imponer y cobrar tarifas de agua y de alcantarillado que sean suficientes para proveer al pago de los intereses y á la amortización del capital del costo de esas obras dentro del término de cincuenta años; y al expirar esos cincuenta años el alcantarillado y el acueducto vendrán á ser propiedad de las ciudades de Panamá y Colón, respectivamente, y el uso del agua será libre para los habitantes de Panamá y Colón, excepto en cuanto la contribución de agua sea necesaria para el servicio y conservación de dicho sistema de albañales y acueducto.

La República de Panamá conviene en que las ciudades de Panamá y Colón cumplirán á perpetuidad las disposiciones sanitarias de carácter preventivo ó curativo dictadas por los Estados Unidos y si llega el caso de que el Gobierno de Panamá no pueda ó falte á su deber de hacer que se cumplan tales disposiciones en Panamá y Colón, la República de Panamá concede á los Estados Unidos el derecho y la autoridad de ponerlas en vigor. El mismo derecho y la misma autoridad se concede á los Estados Unidos para el mantenimiento del órden público en las ciudades de Panamá y Colón y sus territorios y bahías adyacentes en caso de que, á juicio de los Estados Unidos, la República de Panamá no pueda mantenerlo.

ART. 8. La República de Panamá concede á los Estados Unidos todos los derechos que hoy tiene y que más tarde pueda adquirir sobre las propiedades de la Compañía Nueva del Canal de Panamá y la Compañía del Ferrocarril, como resultado del traspaso de soberanía de la República de Colombia sobre el Istmo de Panamá y autoriza á la Compañía Nueva del Canal de Panamá para vender y traspasar á los Estados Unidos sus derechos, privilegios, propiedades y concesiones, como también el Ferrocarril de Panamá, y todas las acciones ó parte de las acciones de dicha Compañía, pero las tierras públicas situadas fuera de la zona descrita en el artículo II de este tratado, actualmente incluídas en las concesiones á ambas de las expresadas Compañías y que no sean necesarias para la construcción y servicio del Canal, volverán á poder de la República con excepción de aquellas propiedades que ahora pertenecen á ó están en posesión de dichas Compañías en Panamá ó Colón ó en los puertos terminales de éstas.

ART. 9. Los Estados Unidos convienen en que los puertos en ambas entradas del Canal y aguas de éstas, y la República de Panamá conviene en que las poblaciones de Panamá y Colón sean libres en todo tiempo de modo que en ellos no se impondrá ni cobrarán derechos de aduana, tonelaje, anclaje, faros, muelles, pilotaje ó cuarentena ni ninguna otra contribución ó derecho sobre las naves que usen ó que pasen por el Canal ó que pertenezcan á los Estados Unidos ó que sean empleados por ellos directa ó indirectamente en conexión con la construcción, mantenimiento, servicio, saneamiento y protección del Canal principal ú obras auxiliares ó sobre la carga, oficiales, tripulación ó pasajeros de ninguna de las dichas naves, excepto los derechos é impuestos que establezcan los Estados Unidos por el uso del Canal ú otras obras y excepto los derechos é impuestos que establezca la República de Panamá sobre las mercancías destinadas á ser introducidas para el consumo del resto de la República de Panamá y sobre los buques que toquen en los puertos de Panamá y Colón y que no crucen el Canal.

El Gobierno de la República de Panamá tendrá el derecho de establecer en dichos puertos y en las ciudades de Panamá y Colón los edificios y vigilancia que crea necesarios para el cobro de derechos sobre importaciones distinadas á otras partes de Panamá y para impedir los contrabandos. Los Estados Unidos tendrán el derecho de hacer uso de las poblaciones y puertos de Panamá y Colón como lugares de anclaje y para hacer reparaciones, trasbordar cargas ya sean de tránsito ó destinadas al servicio de Canal ó para otros trabajos que pertenezcan al Canal.

ART. 10. La República de Panamá se obliga á no imponer contribuciones de ninguna clase, ya sean nacionales, municipales ó departamentales sobre el Canal, los ferrocarriles y obras auxiliares, remolcadores, naves empleadas en el servicio de Canal, depósitos, talleres, oficinas, habitaciones para obreros, fábricas de todas clases, almacenes, muelles, maquinaria y demás obras, á sus oficiales ó empleados que se encuentren dentro de las ciudades de Panamá y Colón; y á no establecer contribuciones ó impuestos de carácter personal de ninguna clase que deban pagar los oficiales, empleados, obreros y demás individuos al servicio del Canal y ferrocarriles y obras auxiliares.

ART. 11. Los Estados Unidos se obligan á trasmitir los despachos oficiales del Gobierno de la República de Panamá por las líneas telegráficas y telefónicas establecidas para el Canal y usadas para negocios públicos y privados á precios no mayores que los exigidos de los empleados al servicio de los Estados Unidos.

ART. 12. El Gobierno de la República de Panamá permitirá la inmigración y libre acceso á las tierras y talleres del Canal y á sus obras auxiliares de todos los empleados y obreros de cualquiera nacionalidad bajo contrato de trabajar en el Canal ó que busquen empleo en él ó que estén relacionados con el dicho Canal y obras auxiliares, con sus respectivas familias y todas estas personas estarán libres del servicio militar de la República de Panamá.

ART. 13. Los Estados Unidos podrán importar en cualquier tiempo á dicha zona y obras auxiliares, libres de derechos de aduana, impuestos, contribuciones y gravámenes de otra clase y sin ninguna restricción, toda clase de naves, dragas, máquinas, carros, maquinarias, instrumentos, explosivos, materiales, abastos y otros artículos necesarios y convenientes para la construcción, conservación, servicio, sanidad y protección del Canal y de sus obras auxiliares, y todas las provisiones, medicinas, vestidos, abastos y otras cosas necesarias y convenientes para los oficiales, empleados, obreros y jornaleros al servicio y en el empleo de los Estados Unidos y para sus familias. Si de algunos de esos artículos se dispone y se hace uso fuera de la zona y de las tierras accesorias concedidas á los Estados Unidos y dentro del territorio de la República, quedarán sujetos á los mismos impuestos de importación ú otros derechos á que lo están iguales artículos importados bajo las leyes de la República de Panamá.

ART. 14. Como precio ó compensación por los derechos, poder y privilegios concedidos en esta convención por la República de Panamá á los Estados Unidos, el Gobierno de los Estados Unidos se obliga á pagar á la República de Panamá la suma de diez millones de dollars ($10,000,000) en oro amonedado de los Estados Unidos al efectuarse el canje de la ratificación de este convenio y también un pago anual de doscientos cincuenta mil dollars ($250,000) en la misma moneda de oro durante la vida de esta convención, principiando nueve años después de la fecha antes expresada.

Las provisiones de este artículo serán en adición á todos los demás beneficios asegurados á la República de Panamá en esta convención. Pero ninguna demora ó diferencia de opiniones repecto de este artículo ó de otras estipulaciones de este tratado afectará ó interrumpirá la completa ejecución y efectos de esta convención en todos los demás respectos.

ART. 15. La Comisión mixta á que se refiere el artículo 6 se establecerá como sigue:

El Presidente de los Estados Unidos nombrará dos personas y el Presidente de la República de Panamá nombrará dos personas y ellas procederán á dictar una decisión; pero en caso de desacuerdo de la Comisión (con motivo de estar igualmente divididas sus conclusiones) se nombrará por los dos Gobiernos un dirimente que dictará su decisión. En caso de muerte, ausencia ó incapacidad de un miembro de la comisión ó del dirimente, ó en caso de omisión, excusa ó cesación de actuar, su puesto será llenado por nombramiento de otra persona del modo antes indicado. Todas las decisiones dictadas por la mayoría de la Comisión ó por el dirimente serán finales.

ART. 16. Los dos Gobiernos proveerán de modo adecuado por un arreglo futuro á la persecución, captura, prisión, detención y entrega en dicha zona y tierras accesorias á las autoridades de la República de Panamá de las personas acusadas de la comisión de crímenes, delitos ó faltas fuera de dicha zona, y para la persecución, captura, prisión, detención y entrega fuera de dicha zona á las autoridades de los Estados Unidos de personas acusadas de la comisión de crímenes, delitos ó faltas en la zona mencionada y sus tierras accesorias.

ART. 17. La República de Panamá concede a los Estados Unidos el uso de todos los puertos de la República abiertos al comercio, como lugares de refugio para todas las naves empleadas en la empresa del Canal y para todas aquellas que hallándose en las mismas circunstancias de arribada forzosa vayan destinadas á atravesar el Canal y necesiten anclar en dichos puertos. Esas naves estarán exentas de derechos de anclaje y tonelaje por parte de la República de Panamá.

ART. 18. El Canal, una vez construído, y las entradas á él serán neutrales perpetuamente y estarán abiertas en los términos de la sección I del artículo tercero del tratado celebrado entre los Estados Unidos y la Gran Bretaña el 18 de Noviembre de 1901 y de conformidad con las estipulaciones de este tratado.

ART. 19. El Gobierno de la República de Panamá tendrá el derecho de transportar por el Canal sus naves, tropas y elementos de guerra en esas naves en todo tiempo sin pagar derechos de ninguna clase. Esta exención se extiende al Ferrocarril auxiliar para el trasporte de las personas el servicio de la República de Panamá y de la fuerza de policía encargada de guardar el orden público fuera de la dicha zona, así como para sus equipajes pertrechos y provisiones.

ART. 20. Si en virtud de algún tratado existente en relación con el territorio del Istmo de Panamá, cuyas obligaciones corresponden ó sean asumidas por la República de Panamá, existieren algunos privilegios ó concesiones en favor del Gobierno ó de los ciudadanos y súbditos de una tercera potencia, relativos á una vía de comunicación interocéánica, que en alguna de sus estipulaciones puedan ser incompatibles con los términos de la presente convención, la República de Panamá se obliga á cancelar ó modificar tal tratado en debida forma para lo cual le dará al dicho tercer poder la necesaria notificación dentro del término de cuatro meses desde la fecha de esta convención, y en caso de que el tratado existente no contenga cláusula que permita su modificación ó anulación, la República de Panamá se obliga á procurar su modificación ó anulación en tal forma que no exista conflicto con las estipulaciones de la presente convención.

ART. 21. Los derechos y privilegios concedidos por la República de Panamá á los Estados Unidos en los artículos precedentes se entiende que están libres de toda deuda, limitación, enfiteusis ó responsabilidad anterior, ó de concesiones ó privilegios á otros Gobiernos, corporaciones, sindicatos é individuos, y en consecuencia si surgieren algunos reclamos con motivo de las presentes concesiones y privilegios ó de otro modo los reclamantes se dirigirán contra la República de Panamá y no contra los Estados Unidas para obtener la indemnización ó el arreglo que pueda ser del caso.

ART. 22. La República de Panamá renuncia y concede á los Estados Unidos la participación á que puede tener derecho en los futuros productos del Canal fijada en el artículo 15 de Contrato de concesión celebrado con Lucien N. B. Wyse del cual hoy es dueño la Compañía Nueva del Canal de Panamá y á cualesquiera otros derechos ó reclamos de naturaleza pecuniaria que pudieran originarse de esa concesión ó relativos á ella ó que pudieran surgir de las concesiones á la Compañía del Ferrocarril de Panamá ó relativas á ellas, ó á algunas de sus modificaciones ó prorrogas; y del mismo modo renuncia, confirma y concede á los Estados Unidos desde ahora y para el futuro todos los derechos y propiedades reservadas en las mencionadas concesiones y que de otro modo habrían de corresponderle á Panamá antes ó á la expiración de los términos de noventa y nueve años de las concesiones otorgadas, al interesado y á las Compañías arriba mencionadas y todo derecho, título y participación que ahora tenga y que en lo futuro pueda corresponderle en las tierras en el Canal, en las obras propiedades y derechos pertenecientes á dichas compañías en virtud de las citadas concesiones ó de otra manera, y los que los Estados Unidos hayan adquirido ó adquieran de la Compañía Nueva del Canal de Panamá ó por su conducto incluyendo cualesquiera propiedades ó derechos que en lo futuro pudieren corresponderle á la República de Panamá en virtud del trascurso del tiempo de caducidad ó de otra manera, en virtud de reversión según los contratos ó concesiones con dicho Wyse, la Compañía Universal del Canal de Panamá, la Compañía del Ferrocarril de Panamá y la Compañía nueva del Canal de Panamá.

Los arriba mencionados derechos y propiedades quedarán libres de todos los derechos de reversión que pueda tener Panamá y el título de los Estados Unidos, cuando se efectúe la compra proyectada á la Compañía Nueva del Canal de Panamá, será absoluto en cuanto toca á la República de Panamá, exceptuándose siempre los derechos de la República expresamente asegurados en este tratado.

ART. 23. Si en algún tiempo fuere necesario el empleo de fuerzas armadas para la seguridad y protección del Canal ó de las naves que lo usen, ó de los ferrocarriles y obras auxiliares, los Estados Unidos tendrán el derecho en todo tiempo y á su juico para usar su fuerza de policía y sus fuerzas terrestres y navales ó para establecer fortificaciones con ese objeto.

ART. 24. Ningún cambio en el Gobierno ó en las leyes y tratados de la República de Panamá afectará, sin el consentimiento de los Estados Unidos, los derechos que correspondan á los Estados Unidos en virtud de esta convención ó en virtud de estipulaciones en tratados que existan entre los dos países ó que para lo futuro lleguen á existir en lo relativo al objeto de esta convención.

Si la República de Panamá llegare á ser más tarde parte constituyente de otro Gobierno ó forme unión ó confederación de Estados de tal modo que su soberanía ó independencia quede confundida con la de otro Gobierno, unión ó confederación, los derechos de los Estados Unidos según esta convención no serán de manera alguna minorados ó restringidos.

ART. 25. Para el mejor cumplimiento de las obligaciones de esta convención y con el fin de dar protección eficaz al Canal y de preservar su neutralidad, el Gobierno de la República de Panamá venderá ó arrendará á los Estados Unidos las tierras adecuadas y necesarias para estaciones navales ó carboneras en la costa del Pacífico y en la parte occidental de la costa del mar Caribe de la República en ciertos puntos que serán convenidos con el Presidente de los Estados Unidos.

ART. 26. Esta Convención, dispués de firmada por los Plenipotenciarios de las partes contratantes, será ratificada por los respectivos Gobiernos y las ratificaciones canjeadas en Washington á la mayor brevedad posible.

En fé de lo cual los respectivos Plenipotenciarios firman la presente convención en duplicado y la sellan con sus respectivos sellos.

Hecha en la ciudad de Washington el 18 de Noviembre del año del Señor de mil novecientos tres.

y Considerando:

1º Que en ese tratado se ha obtenido para la República la garantía de su independencia;

2º Que por razones de seguridad exterior es indispensable proceder con la mayor celeridad á la consideración del tratado, á efecto de que esa obligación principal por parte de los Estados Unidos de América, principie á ser cumplida con eficacia;

3º Que con el tratado se realiza la aspiración de los pueblos del Istmo cual es la apertura del canal y su servicio en favor del comercio de todas las naciones; y

4º Que la Junta de Gobierno Provisional formada por voluntad unánime de los pueblos de la República, posee todos los poderes del soberano del territorio,

DECRETA:

[H. R. 21969.]

An act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone.

Be it enacted, etc., That the zone of land and land under water of the width of 10 miles extending to the distance of 5 miles on each side of the center line of the route of the canal now being constructed thereon, which zone begins in the Caribbean Sea 3 marine miles from mean low-water mark and extends to and across the Isthmus of Panama into the Pacific Ocean to the distance of 3 marine miles from mean low-water mark, excluding therefrom the cities of Panama and Colon and their adjacent harbors located within said zone, as excepted in the treaty with the Republic of Panama dated November 18, 1903, but including all islands within said described zone, and in addition thereto the group of islands in the Bay of Panama named Perico, Naos, Culebra, and Flamenco, and any lands and waters outside of said limits above described which are necessary or convenient or from time to time may become necessary or convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, or protection of the said canal or of any auxiliary canals, lakes, or other works necessary or convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, or protection of said canal, the use, occupancy, or control whereof were granted to the United States by the treaty between the United States and the Republic of Panama, the ratifications of which were exchanged on the 26th day of February, 1904, shall be known and designated as the Canal Zone, and the canal now being constructed thereon shall hereafter be known and designated as the Panama Canal. The President is authorized, by treaty with the Republic of Panama, to acquire any additional land or land under water not already granted, or which was excepted from the grant, that he may deem necessary for the operation, maintenance, sanitation, or protection of the Panama Canal, and to exchange any land or land under water not deemed necessary for such purposes for other land or land under water which may be deemed necessary for such purposes, which additional land or land under water so acquired shall become part of the Canal Zone.

SEC. 2. That all laws, orders, regulations, and ordinances adopted and promulgated in the Canal Zone by order of the President for the government and sanitation of the Canal Zone and the construction of the Panama Canal are hereby ratified and confirmed as valid and binding until Congress shall otherwise provide. The existing courts established in the Canal Zone by Executive order are recognized and confirmed to continue in operation until the courts provided for in this act shall be established.

SEC. 3. That the President is authorized to declare by Executive order that all land and land under water within the limits of the Canal Zone is necessary for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, or protection of the Panama Canal, and to extinguish, by agreement when advisable, all claims and titles of adverse claimants and occupants. Upon failure to secure by agreement title to any such parcel of land or land under water the adverse claim or occupancy shall be disposed of and title thereto secured in the United States and compensation therefor fixed and paid in the manner provided in the aforesaid treaty with the Republic of Panama, or such modification of such treaty as may hereafter be made.

SEC. 4. That when in the judgment of the President the construction of the Panama Canal shall be sufficiently advanced toward completion to render the further services of the Isthmian Canal Commission unnecessary the President is authorized by Executive order to discontinue the Isthmian Canal Commission, which, together with the present organization, shall then cease to exist; and the President is authorized thereafter to complete, govern, and operate the Panama Canal and govern the Canal Zone, or cause them to be completed, governed, and operated, through a governor of the Panama Canal and such other persons as he may deem competent to discharge the various duties connected with the completion, care, maintenance, sanitation, operation, government, and protection of the canal and Canal Zone. If any of the persons appointed or employed as aforesaid shall be persons in the military or naval service of the United States, the amount of the official salary paid to any such person shall be deducted from the amount of salary or compensation provided by or which shall be fixed under the terms of this act. The governor of the Panama Canal shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, commissioned for a term of four years, and until his successor shall be appointed and qualified. He shall receive a salary of $10,000 a year. All other persons necessary for the completion, care, management, maintenance, sanitation, government, operation, and protection of the Panama Canal and Canal Zone shall be appointed by the President, or by his authority, removable at his pleasure, and the compensation of such persons shall be fixed by the President, or by his authority, until such time as Congress may by law regulate the same, but salaries or compensation fixed hereunder by the President shall in no instance exceed by more than 25 per cent the salary or compensation paid for the same or similar services to persons employed by the Government in continental United States. That upon the completion of the Panama Canal the President shall cause the same to be officially and formally opened for use and operation.

Before the completion of the canal, the Commission of Arts may make report to the President of their recommendation regarding the artistic character of the structures of the canal, such report to be transmitted to Congress.

SEC. 5. That the President is hereby authorized to prescribe and from time to time change the tolls that shall be levied by the Government of the United States for the use of the Panama Canal: Provided, That no tolls, when prescribed as above, shall be changed, unless six months' notice thereof shall have been given by the President by proclamation. No tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States. That section 4132 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4132. Vessels built within the United States and belonging wholly to citizens thereof; and vessels which may be captured in war by citizens of the United States and lawfully condemned as prize, or which may be adjudged to be forfeited for a breach of the laws of the United States; and seagoing vessels, whether steam or sail, which have been certified by the Steamboat-Inspection Service as safe to carry dry and perishable cargo, not more than 5 years old at the time they apply for registry, wherever built, which are to engage only in trade with foreign countries or with the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila, being wholly owned by citizens of the United States or corporations organized and chartered under the laws of the United States or of any State thereof, the president and managing directors of which shall be citizens of the United States or corporations organized and chartered under the laws of the United States or of any State thereof, the president and managing directors of which shall be citizens of the United States, and no others, may be registered as directed in this title. Foreign-built vessels registered pursuant to this act shall not engage in the coastwise trade: Provided, That a foreign-built yacht, pleasure boat, or vessel not used or intended to be used for trade admitted to American registry pursuant to this section shall not be exempt from the collection of ad valorem duty provided in section 37 of the act approved August 5, 1909, entitled 'An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes.' That all materials of foreign production which may be necessary for the construction or repair of vessels built in the United States and all such materials necessary for the building or repair of their machinery, and all articles necessary for their outfit and equipment may be imported into the United States free of duty under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe: Provided further, That such vessels so admitted under the provisions of this section may contract with the Postmaster General under the act of March 3, 1891, entitled 'An act to provide for ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports, and to promote commerce,' so long as such vessels shall in all respects comply with the provisions and requirements of said act."

Tolls may be based upon gross or net registered tonnage, displacement tonnage, or otherwise, and may be based on one form of tonnage for warships and another for ships of commerce. The rate of tolls may be lower upon vessels in ballast than upon vessels carrying passengers or cargo. When based upon net registered tonnage for ships of commerce the tolls shall not exceed $1.25 per net registered ton nor be less, other than for vessels of the United States and its citizens, than the estimated proportionate cost of the actual maintenance and operation of the canal, subject, however, to the provisions of article 19 of the convention between the United States and the Republic of Panama, entered into November 18, 1903. If the tolls shall not be based upon net registered tonnage, they shall not exceed the equivalent of $1.25 per net registered ton as nearly as the same may be determined, nor be less than the equivalent of 75 cents per net registered ton. The toll for each passenger shall not be more than $1.50. The President is authorized to make and from time to time amend regulations governing the operation of the Panama Canal and the passage and control of vessels through the same or any part thereof, including the locks and approaches thereto, and all rules and regulations affecting pilots and pilotage in the canal or the approaches thereto through the adjacent waters.

Such regulations shall provide for prompt adjustment by agreement and immediate payment of claims for damages which may arise from injury to vessels, cargo, or passengers from the passing of vessels through the locks under the control of those operating them under such rules and regulations. In case of disagreement suit may be brought in the district court of the Canal Zone against the governor of the Panama Canal. The hearing and disposition of such cases shall be expedited and the judgment shall be immediately paid out of any moneys appropriated or allotted for canal operation.

The President shall provide a method for the determination and adjustment of all claims arising out of personal injuries to employees thereafter occurring while directly engaged in actual work in connection with the construction, maintenance, operation, or sanitation of the canal or of the Panama Railroad, or of any auxiliary canals, locks, or other works necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, or sanitation of the canal, whether such injuries result in death or not, and prescribe a schedule of compensation therefor, and may revise and modify such method and schedule at any time; and such claims, to the extent they shall be allowed on such adjustment, if allowed at all, shall be paid out of the moneys hereafter appropriated for that purpose or out of the funds of the Panama Railroad Company, if said company was responsible for said injury, as the case may require. And after such method and schedule shall be provided by the President, the provisions of the act entitled "An act granting to certain employees of the United States the right to receive from it compensation for injuries sustained in the course of their employment," approved May 30, 1908, and of the act entitled "An act relating to injured employees on the Isthmian Canal," approved February 24, 1909, shall not apply to personal injuries thereafter received and claims for which are subject to determination and adjustment as provided in this section.

SEC. 6. That the President is authorized to cause to be erected, maintained, and operated, subject to the international convention and the act of Congress to regulate radio-communication, at suitable places along the Panama Canal and the coast adjacent to its two terminals, in connection with the operation of said canal, such wireless telegraphic installations as he may deem necessary for the operation, maintenance, sanitation, and protection of said canal, and for other purposes. If it is found necessary to locate such installations upon territory of the Republic of Panama, the President is authorized to make such agreement with said Government as may be necessary, and also to provide for the acceptance and transmission, by said system, of all private and commercial messages, and those of the Government of Panama, on such terms and for such tolls as the President may prescribe: Provided, That the messages of the Government of the United States and the departments thereof, and the management of the Panama Canal, shall always be given precedence over all other messages. The President is also authorized, in his discretion, to enter into such operating agreements or leases with any private wireless company or companies as may best insure freedom from interference with the wireless telegraphic installations established by the United States. The President is also authorized to establish, maintain, and operate, through the Panama Railroad Company or otherwise, dry docks, repair shops, yards, docks, wharves, warehouses, storehouses, and other necessary facilities and appurtenances for the purpose of providing coal and other materials, labor, repairs, and supplies for vessels of the Government of the United States and, incidentally, for supplying such at reasonable prices to passing vessels, in accordance with appropriations hereby authorized to be made from time to time by Congress as a part of the maintenance and operation of the said canal. Moneys received from the conduct of said business may be expended and reinvested for such purposes without being covered into the Treasury of the United States; and such moneys are hereby appropriated for such purposes, but all deposits of such funds shall be subject to the provisions of existing law relating to the deposit of other public funds of the United States, and any net profits accruing from such business shall annually be covered into the Treasury of the United States. Monthly reports of such receipts and expenditures shall be made to the President by the persons in charge, and annual reports shall be made to the Congress.

SEC. 7. That the governor of the Panama Canal shall, in connection with the operation of such canal, have official control and jurisdiction over the Canal Zone and shall perform all duties in connection with the civil government of the Canal Zone, which is to be held, treated, and governed as an adjunct of such Panama Canal. Unless in this act otherwise provided, all existing laws of the Canal Zone referring to the civil governor or the civil administration of the Canal Zone shall be applicable to the governor of the Panama Canal, who shall perform all such executive and administrative duties required by existing law. The President is authorized to determine or cause to be determined what towns shall exist in the Canal Zone and subdivide, and from time to time resubdivide, said Canal Zone into subdivisions, to be designated by name or number, so that there shall be situated one town in each subdivision, and the boundaries of each subdivision shall be clearly defined. In each town there shall be a magistrate's court with exclusive original jurisdiction coextensive with the subdivision in which it is situated of all civil cases in which the principal sum claimed does not exceed $300 and all criminal cases wherein the punishment that may be imposed shall not exceed a fine of $100 or imprisonment not exceeding 30 days, or both, and all violations of police regulations and ordinances and all actions involving possession or title to personal property or the forcible entry and detainer of real estate. Such magistrates shall also hold preliminary investigations in charges of felony and offenses under section 10 of this act and commit or bail in bailable cases to the district court. A sufficient number of magistrates and constables, who must be citizens of the United States, to conduct the business of such courts shall be appointed by the governor of the Panama Canal for terms of four years and until their successors are appointed and qualified, and the compensation of such persons shall be fixed by the President, or by his authority, until such time as Congress may by law regulate the same. The rules governing said courts and prescribing the duties of said magistrates and constables, oaths and bonds, the times and places of holding such courts, the disposition of fines, costs, forfeitures, enforcements of judgments, providing for appeals therefrom to the district court, and the disposition, treatment, and pardon of convicts shall be established by order of the President. The governor of the Panama Canal shall appoint all notaries public, prescribe their powers and duties, their official seal, and the fees to be charged and collected by them.

SEC. 8. That there shall be in the Canal Zone one district court with two divisions, one including Balboa, and the other including Cristobal; and one district judge of the said district, who shall hold his court in both divisions at such times, as he may designate by order, at least once a month in each division. The rules of practice in such district court shall be prescribed or amended by order of the President. The said district court shall have original jurisdiction of all felony cases, of offenses arising under section 10 of this act, all causes in equity, admiralty, and all cases at law involving principal sums exceeding $300, and all appeals from judgments rendered in magistrates' courts. The jurisdiction in admiralty herein conferred upon the district judge and the district court shall be the same that is exercised by the United States district judges and the United States district courts, and the procedure and practice shall also be the same. The district court or the judge thereof shall also have jurisdiction of all other matters and proceedings not herein provided for which are now within the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the Canal Zone, of the Circuit Court of the Canal Zone, the District Court of the Canal Zone, or the judges thereof. Said judge shall provide for the selection, summoning, serving, and compensation of jurors from among the citizens of the United States, to be subject to jury duty in either division of such district, and a jury shall be had in any criminal case or civil case at law originating in said court on the demand of either party. There shall be a district attorney and a marshal for said district. It shall be the duty of the district attorney to conduct all business, civil and criminal, for the Government, and to advise the governor of the Panama Canal on all legal questions touching the operation of the canal and the administration of civil affairs. It shall be the duty of the marshal to execute all process of the court, preserve order therein, and do all things incident to the office of marshal. The district judge, the district attorney, and the marshal shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for terms of four years each, and until their successors are appointed and qualified, and during their terms of office shall reside within the Canal Zone, and shall hold no other office nor serve on any official board or commission nor receive any emoluments except their salaries. The district judge shall receive the same salary paid the district judges of the United States, and shall appoint the clerk of said court, and may appoint one assistant when necessary, who shall receive salaries to be fixed by the President. The district judge shall be entitled to six weeks' leave of absence each year with pay. During his absence or during any period of disability or disqualification, from sickness or otherwise, to discharge his duties the same shall be temporarily performed by any circuit or district judge of the United States who may be designated by the President, and who, during such service, shall receive the additional mileage and per diem allowed by law to district judges of the United States when holding court away from their homes. The district attorney and the marshal shall be paid each a salary of $5,000 per annum.

SEC. 9. That the records of the existing courts, and all causes, proceedings, and criminal prosecutions pending therein, as shown by the dockets thereof, except as herein otherwise provided, shall immediately upon the organization of the courts created by this act be transferred to such new courts having jurisdiction of like cases, be entered upon the dockets thereof, and proceed as if they had originally been brought therein; whereupon all the existing courts, except the Supreme Court of the Canal Zone, shall cease to exist. The President may continue the Supreme Court of the Canal Zone and retain the judges thereof in office for such time as to him may seem necessary to determine finally any causes and proceedings which may be pending therein. All laws of the Canal Zone imposing duties upon the clerks or ministerial officers of existing courts shall apply and impose such duties upon the clerks and ministerial officers of the new courts created by this act having jurisdiction of like cases, matters, and duties.

All existing laws in the Canal Zone governing practice and procedure in existing courts shall be applicable and adapted to the practice and procedure in the new courts.

The circuit court of appeals of the fifth circuit of the United States shall have jurisdiction to review, revise, modify, reverse, or affirm the final judgments and decrees of the district court of the Canal Zone and to render such judgments as in the opinion of the said appellate court should have been rendered by the trial court in all actions and proceedings in which the Constitution or any statute, treaty, title, right, or privilege of the United States is involved and a right thereunder denied, and in cases in which the value in controversy exceeds $1,000, to be ascertained by the oath of either party, or by other competent evidence, and also in criminal causes wherein the offense charged is punishable as a felony. And such appellate jurisdiction, subject to the right of review by or appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States as in other cases authorized by law, may be exercised by said circuit court of appeals in the same manner, under the same regulations, and by the same procedure as nearly as practicable as is done in reviewing the final judgments and decrees of the district courts of the United States.

SEC. 10. That after the Panama Canal shall have been completed and opened for operation the governor of the Panama Canal shall have the right to make such rules and regulations, subject to the approval of the President, touching the right of any person to remain upon or pass over any part of the Canal Zone as may be necessary. Any person violating any of such rules or regulations shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction in the district court of the Canal Zone shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $500 or by imprisonment not exceeding a year, or both, in the discretion of the court. It shall be unlawful for any person, by any means or in any way, to injure or obstruct, or attempt to injure or obstruct, any part of the Panama Canal or the locks thereof or the approaches thereto. Any person violating this provision shall be guilty of a felony, and on conviction in the district court of the Canal Zone shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $10,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding 20 years, or both, in the discretion of the court. If the act shall cause the death of any person within a year and a day thereafter, the person so convicted shall be guilty of murder and shall be punished accordingly.

SEC. 11. That section 5 of the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, as heretofore amended, is hereby amended by adding thereto a new paragraph at the end thereof, as follows:

"From and after the 1st day of July, 1914, it shall be unlawful for any railroad company or other common carrier subject to the act to regulate commerce to own, lease, operate, control, or have any interest whatsoever (by stock ownership or otherwise, either directly, indirectly, through any holding company, or by stockholders or directors in common, or in any other manner) in any common carrier by water operated through the Panama Canal or elsewhere with which said railroad or other carrier aforesaid does or may compete for traffic or any vessel carrying freight or passengers upon said water route or elsewhere with which said railroad or other carrier aforesaid does or may compete for traffic; and in case of the violation of this provision each day in which such violation continues shall be deemed a separate offense."

Jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the Interstate Commerce Commission to determine questions of fact as to the competition or possibility of competition, after full hearing, on the application of any railroad company or other carrier. Such application may be filed for the purpose of determining whether any existing service is in violation of this section and pray for an order permitting the continuance of any vessel or vessels already in operation, or for the purpose of asking an order to install new service not in conflict with the provisions of this paragraph. The commission may on its own motion or the application of any shipper institute proceedings to inquire into the operation of any vessel in use by any railroad or other carrier which has not applied to the commission and had the question of competition or the possibility of competition determined as herein provided. In all such cases the order of said commission shall be final.

If the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be of the opinion that any such existing specified service by water other than through the Panama Canal is being operated in the interest of the public and is of advantage to the convenience and commerce of the people, and that such extension will neither exclude, prevent, nor reduce competition on the route by water under consideration, the Interstate Commerce Commission may, by order, extend the time during which such service by water may continue to be operated beyond July 1, 1914. In every case of such extension the rates, schedules, and practices, of such water carrier shall be filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission and shall be subject to the act to regulate commerce and all amendments thereto in the same manner and to the same extent as is the railroad or other common carrier controlling such water carrier or interested in any manner in its operation: Provided, Any application for extension under the terms of this provision filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission prior to July 1, 1914, but for any reason not heard and disposed of before said date, may be considered and granted thereafter.

No vessel permitted to engage in the coastwise or foreign trade of the United States shall be permitted to enter or pass through said canal if such ship is owned, chartered, operated, or controlled by any person or company which is doing business in violation of the provisions of the act of Congress approved July 2, 1890, entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," or the provisions of sections 73 to 77, both inclusive, of an act approved August 27, 1894, entitled "An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," or the provisions of any other act of Congress amending or supplementing the said act of July 2, 1890, commonly known as the Sherman Antitrust Act, and amendments thereto, or said sections of the act of August 27, 1894. The question of fact may be determined by the judgment of any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction in any cause pending before it to which the owners or operators of such ship are parties. Suit may be brought by any shipper or by the Attorney General of the United States.

That section 6 of said act to regulate commerce, as heretofore amended, is hereby amended by adding a new paragraph at the end thereof, as follows:

"When property may be or is transported from point to point in the United States by rail and water through the Panama Canal or otherwise, the transportation being by a common carrier or carriers, and not entirely within the limits of a single State, the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have jurisdiction of such transportation and of the carriers, both by rail and by water, which may or do engage in the same, in the following particulars, in addition to the jurisdiction given by the act to regulate commerce, as amended June 18, 1910:

"(a) To establish physical connection between the lines of the rail carrier and the dock of the water carrier by directing the rail carrier to make suitable connection between its line and a track or tracks which have been constructed from the dock to the limits of its right of way, or by directing either or both the rail and water carrier, individually or in connection with one another, to construct and connect with the lines of the rail carrier a spur track or tracks to the dock. This provision shall only apply where such connection is reasonably practicable, can be made with safety to the public, and where the amount of business to be handled is sufficient to justify the outlay.

"The commission shall have full authority to determine the terms and conditions upon which these connecting tracks, when constructed, shall be operated, and it may, either in the construction or the operation of such tracks, determine what sum shall be paid to or by either carrier. The provisions of this paragraph shall extend to cases where the dock is owned by other parties than the carrier involved.

"(b) To establish through routes and maximum joint rates between and over such rail and water lines, and to determine all the terms and conditions under which such lines shall be operated in the handling of the traffic embraced.

"(c) To establish maximum proportional rates by rail to and from the ports to which the traffic is brought, or from which it is taken by the water carrier, and to determine to what traffic and in connection with what vessels and upon what terms and conditions such rates shall apply. By proportional rates are meant those which differ from the corresponding local rates to and from the port and which apply only to traffic which has been brought to the port or is carried from the port by a common carrier by water.

"(d) If any rail carrier subject to the act to regulate commerce enters into arrangements with any water carrier operating from a port in the United States to a foreign country, through the Panama Canal or otherwise, for the handling of through business between interior points of the United States and such foreign country, the Interstate Commerce Commission may require such railway to enter into similar arrangements with any or all other lines of steamships operating from said port to the same foreign country."

The orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission relating to this section shall only be made upon formal complaint or in proceedings instituted by the commission of its own motion and after full hearing. The orders provided for in the two amendments to the act to regulate commerce enacted in this section shall be served in the same manner and enforced by the same penalties and proceedings as are the orders of the commission made under the provisions of section 15 of the act to regulate commerce, as amended June 18, 1910, and they may be conditioned for the payment of any sum or the giving of security for the payment of any sum or the discharge of any obligation which may be required by the terms of said order.

SEC. 12. That all laws and treaties relating to the extradition of persons accused of crime in force in the United States, to the extent that they may not be in conflict with or superseded by any special treaty entered into between the United States and the Republic of Panama with respect to the Canal Zone, and all laws relating to the rendition of fugitives from justice as between the several States and Territories of the United States, shall extend to and be considered in force in the Canal Zone, and for such purposes and such purposes only the Canal Zone shall be considered and treated as an organized Territory of the United States.

SEC. 13. That in time of war in which the United States shall be engaged, or when, in the opinion of the President, war is imminent, such officer of the Army as the President may designate shall, upon the order of the President, assume and have exclusive authority and jurisdiction over the operation of the Panama Canal and all of its adjuncts, appendants, and appurtenances, including the entire control and government of the Canal Zone, and during a continuance of such condition the governor of the Panama Canal shall, in all respects and particulars as to the operation of such Panama Canal, and all duties, matters, and transactions affecting the Canal Zone, be subject to the order and direction of such officer of the Army.

SEC. 14. That this act shall be known as, and referred to as, the Panama Canal act, and the right to alter, amend, or repeal any or all of its provisions or to extend, modify, or annul any rule or regulation made under its authority is expressly reserved.

Approved, August 24, 1912.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

INSTRUCTION OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE OF JANUARY 17, 1913, TO THE AMERICAN CHARGÉ D'AFFAIRES AT LONDON, AND THE BRITISH NOTES OF JULY 8, 1912, AND NOVEMBER 14, 1912, TO WHICH IT REPLIES.

The Secretary of State to Chargé d'Affaires Laughlin.

No. 1833.] DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 17, 1913.

IRWIN B. LAUGHLIN, Esq.,
American Chargé d'Affaires, London, England.

SIR: I inclose a copy of an instruction from Sir Edward Grey to His Britannic Majesty's ambassador at Washington, dated November 14, 1912, a copy of which was handed to me by the ambassador on the 9th ultimo, in which certain provisions in the Panama Canal act of August 24 last are discussed in their relation to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of November 18, 1901; and I also inclose a copy of the note addressed to me on July 8, 1912, by Mr. A. Mitchell Innes, His Britannic Majesty's chargé d'affaires, stating the objections which his Government entertained to the legislation relating to the Panama Canal, which was then under discussion in Congress. A copy of the President's proclamation of November 13, 1912, fixing the canal tolls, is also inclosed.

Sir Edward Grey's communication, after setting forth the several grounds upon which the British Government believe the provisions of the act are inconsistent with the stipulations of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, states the readiness of his Government "to submit the question to arbitration if the Government of the United States would prefer to take this course" rather than "to take such steps as would remove the objections to the act which His Majesty's Government have stated." It therefore becomes necessary for this Government to examine these objections in order to ascertain exactly in what respects this act is regarded by the British Government as inconsistent with the provisions of that treaty, and also to explain the views of this Government upon the questions thus presented, and to consider the advisability at this time of submitting any of these questions to arbitration.

It may be stated at the outset that this Government does not agree with the interpretation placed by Sir Edward Grey upon the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, or upon the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, but for reasons which will appear hereinbelow it is not deemed necessary at present to amplify or reiterate the views of this Government upon the meaning of those treaties.

In Sir Edward Grey's communication, after explaining in detail the views taken by his Government as to the proper interpretation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, "so as to indicate the limitations which" His Majesty's Government "consider it imposes upon the freedom of action of the United States," he proceeds to indicate the points in which the canal act infringes what he holds to be Great Britain's treaty rights.

It is obvious from the whole tenor of Sir Edward Grey's communication that in writing it he could not have taken cognizance of the President's proclamation fixing the canal tolls. Indeed, a comparison of the dates of the proclamation and the note, which are dated respectively, November 13 and November 14 last, shows that the proclamation could hardly have been received in London in time for consideration in the note. Throughout his discussion of the subject Sir Edward Grey deals chiefly with the possibilities of what the President might do under the act, which in itself does not prescribe the tolls, but merely authorizes the President to do so; and nowhere does the note indicate that Sir Edward Grey was aware of what the President actually had done in issuing this proclamation. The proclamation, therefore, has entirely changed the situation which is discussed by Sir Edward Grey, and the diplomatic discussion, which his note now makes inevitable, must rest upon the bases as they exist at present and not upon the hypothesis formed by the British Government at the time this note was written.

Sir Edward Grey presents the question of conflict between the act and the treaty in the following language:

"It remains to consider whether the Panama Canal Act in its present form conflicts with the treaty rights to which His Majesty's Government maintain they are entitled.

"Under section 5 of the act the President is given, within certain defined limits, the right to fix the tolls, but no tolls are to be levied upon ships engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States, and the tolls, when based upon net registered tonnage for ships of commerce, are not to exceed $1.25 per net registered ton, nor be less, other than for vessels of the United States and its citizens, than the estimated proportionate cost of the actual maintenance and operation of the canal. There is also an exception for the exemptions granted by article 19 of the convention with Panama of 1903.

"The effect of these provisions is that vessels engaged in the coastwise trade will contribute nothing to the upkeep of the canal. Similarly vessels belonging to the Government of the Republic of Panama will, in pursuance of the treaty of 1903, contribute nothing to the upkeep of the canal. Again, in the cases where tolls are levied, the tolls in the case of ships belonging to the United States and its citizens may be fixed at a lower rate than in the case of foreign ships and may be less than the estimated proportionate cost of the actual maintenance and operation of the canal.

"These provisions (1) clearly conflict with the rule embodied in the principle established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of equal treatment for British and United States ships, and (2) would enable tolls to be fixed which would not be just and equitable, and would therefore not comply with rule 1 of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty."

From this it appears that three objections are made to the provisions of the act; first, that no tolls are to be levied upon ships engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States; second, that a discretion appears to be given to the President to discriminate in fixing tolls in favor of ships belonging to the United States and its citizens as against foreign ships; and third, that an exemption has been given to the vessels of the Republic of Panama under article 19 of the convention with Panama of 1903.

Considered in the reverse order of their statement, the third objection, coming at this time, is a great and complete surprise to this Government. The exemption under that article applies only to the Government vessels of Panama, and was part of the agreement with Panama under which the canal was built. The convention containing the exemption was ratified in 1904, and since then to the present time no claim has been made by Great Britain that it conflicted with British rights. The United States has always asserted the principle that the status of the countries immediately concerned by reason of their political relation to the territory in which the canal was to be constructed was different from that of all other countries. The Hay-Herran treaty with Colombia of 1903 also provided that the war vessels of that country were to be given free passage. It has always been supposed by this Government that Great Britain recognized the propriety of the exemptions made in both of those treaties. It is not believed, therefore, that the British Government intend to be understood as proposing arbitration upon the question of whether or not this provision of the act, which in accordance with our treaty with Panama exempts from tolls the Government vessels of Panama, is in conflict with the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Considering the second objection based upon the discretion thought to be conferred upon the President to discriminate in favor of ships belonging to the United States and its citizens, it is sufficient, in view of the fact that the President's proclamation fixing the tolls was silent on the subject, to quote the language used by the President in the memorandum attached to the act at the time of signature, in which he says:

"It is not therefore necessary to discuss the policy of such discrimination until the question may arise in the exercise of the President's discretion."

On this point no question has as yet arisen which, in the words of the existing arbitration treaty between the United States and Great Britain, "it may not have been possible to settle by diplomacy," and until then any suggestion of arbitration may well be regarded as premature.

It is not believed, however, that in the objection now under consideration Great Britain intends to question the right of the United States to exempt from the payment of tolls its vessels of war and other vessels engaged in the service of this Government. Great Britain does not challenge the right of the United States to protect the canal. United States vessels of war and those employed in Government service are a part of our protective system. By the Hay-Pauncefote treaty we assume the sole responsibility for its neutralization. It is inconceivable that this Government should be required to pay canal tolls for the vessels used for protecting the canal, which we alone must protect. The movement of United States vessels in executing governmental policies of protection are not susceptible of explanation or differentiation. The United States could not be called upon to explain what relation the movement of a particular vessel through the canal has to its protection. The British objection, therefore, is understood as having no relation to the use of the canal by vessels in the service of the United States Government.

Regarding the first objection, the question presented by Sir Edward Grey arises solely upon the exemption in the canal act of vessels engaged in our coastwise trade.

On this point Sir Edward Grey says that "His Majesty's Government do not question the right of the United States to grant subsidies to United States shipping generally, or to any particular branches of that shipping," and it is admitted in his note that the exemption of certain classes of ships would be "a form of subsidy" to those vessels; but it appears from the note that His Majesty's Government would regard that form of subsidy as objectionable under the treaty if the effect of such subsidy would be "to impose upon British or other foreign shipping an unfair share of the burden of the upkeep of the canal, or to create a discrimination in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise to prejudice rights secured to British shipping by this treaty."

It is not contended by Great Britain that equality of treatment has any reference to British participation in the coastwise trade of the United States, which, in accordance with general usage, is reserved to American ships. The objection is only to such exemption of that trade from toll payments as may adversely affect British rights to equal treatment in the payment of tolls or to just and equitable tolls. It will be helpful here to recall that we are now only engaged in considering (quoting from Sir Edward Grey's note) "whether the Panama Canal act in its present form conflicts with the treaty rights to which His Majesty's Government maintain they are entitled," concerning which he concludes:

"These provisions (1) clearly conflict with the rule embodied in the principle established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of equal treatment for British and United States ships, and (2) would enable tolls to be fixed which would not be just and equitable, and would therefore not comply with rule 1 of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty."

On the first of these points the objection of the British Government to the exemption of vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States is stated as follows:

* * * "The exemption will, in the opinion of His Majesty's Government, be a violation of the equal treatment secured by the treaty, as it will put the 'coastwise trade' in a preferential position as regards other shipping. Coastwise trade can not be circumscribed so completely that benefits conferred upon it will not affect vessels engaged in the foreign trade. To take an example, if cargo intended for a United States port beyond the canal, either from east or west, and shipped on board a foreign ship could be sent to its destination more cheaply, through the operation of proposed exemption, by being landed at a United States port before reaching the canal, and then sent on as coastwise trade, shippers would benefit by adopting this course in preference to sending the goods direct to their destination through the canal on board the foreign ship."

This objection must be read in connection with the views expressed by the British Government while this act was pending in Congress, which were stated in the note of July 8, 1912, on the subject from Mr. Innes, as follows:

"As to the proposal that exemption shall be given to vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, a more difficult question arises. If the trade should be so regulated as to make it certain that only bona fide coastwise traffic, which is reserved for United States vessels, would be benefited by this exemption, it may be that no objection could be taken."

This statement may fairly be taken as an admission that this Government may exempt its vessels engaged in the coastwise trade from the payment of tolls, provided such exemption be restricted to bona fide coastwise traffic. As to this it is sufficient to say that obviously the United States is not to be denied the power to remit tolls to its own coastwise trade because of a suspicion or possibility that the regulations yet to be framed may not restrict this exemption to bona fide coastwise traffic.

The answer to this objection, therefore, apart from any question of treaty interpretation, is that it rests on conjecture as to what may happen rather than upon proved facts, and does not present a question requiring submission to arbitration, as it has not as yet passed beyond the stage where it can be profitably dealt with by diplomatic discussion. It will be remembered that only questions which it may not be possible to settle by diplomacy are required by our arbitration treaty to be referred to arbitration.

On this same point Sir Edward Grey urges another objection to the exemption of coastwise vessels as follows:

"Again, although certain privileges are granted to vessels engaged in an exclusively coastwise trade, His Majesty's Government are given to understand that there is nothing in the laws of the United States which prevents any United States ship from combining foreign commerce with coastwise trade, and consequently from entering into direct competition with foreign vessels while remaining 'prima facie' entitled to the privilege of free passage through the canal. Moreover, any restriction which may be deemed to be now applicable might at any time be removed by legislation or even perhaps by mere changes in the regulations."

This objection also raises a question which, apart from treaty interpretation, depends upon future conditions and facts not yet ascertained, and for the same reasons as are above stated its submission to arbitration at this time would be premature.

The second point of Sir Edward Grey's objection to the exemption of vessels engaged in coastwise trade remains to be considered. On this point he says that the provisions of the act "would enable tolls to be fixed which would not be just and equitable, and would therefore not comply with rule 1 of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty."

It will be observed that this statement evidently was framed without knowledge of the fact that the President's proclamation fixing the tolls had issued. It is not claimed in the note that the tolls actually fixed are not "just and equitable" or even that all vessels passing through the canal were not taken into account in fixing the amount of the tolls, but only that either or both contingencies are possible.

If the British contention is correct that the true construction of the treaty requires all traffic to be reckoned in fixing just and equitable tolls, it requires at least an allegation that the tolls as fixed are not just and equitable and that all traffic has not been reckoned in fixing them before the United States can be called upon to prove that this course was not followed, even assuming that the burden of proof would rest with the United States in any event, which is open to question. This Government welcomes the opportunity, however, of informing the British Government that the tolls fixed in the President's proclamation are based upon the computations set forth in the report of Prof. Emory R. Johnson, a copy of which is forwarded herewith for delivery to Sir Edward Grey, and that the tolls which would be paid by American coastwise vessels, but for the exemption contained in the act, were computed in determining the rate fixed by the President.

By reference to page 208 of Prof. Johnson's report, it will be seen that the estimated net tonnage of shipping using the canal in 1915 is as follows:

	Tons.
Coast to coast American shipping	1,000,000
American shipping carrying foreign commerce of the United States	720,000
Foreign shipping carrying commerce of the United States and foreign countries	8,780,000

It was on this estimate that tolls fixed in the President's proclamation were based.

Sir Edward Grey says, "This rule (1 of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty) also provides that the tolls should be 'just and equitable.'" The purpose of these words, he adds, "was to limit the tolls to the amount representing the fair value of the services rendered, i. e., to the interest on the capital expended and the cost of the operation and maintenance of the canal." If, as a matter of fact, the tolls now fixed (of which he seems unaware) do not exceed this requirement, and as heretofore pointed out there is no claim that they do, it is not apparent under Sir Edward Grey's contention how Great Britain could be receiving unjust and inequitable treatment if the United States favors its coastwise vessels by not collecting their share of the tolls necessary to meet the requirement. There is a very clear distinction between an omission to "take into account" the coastwise tolls in order to determine a just and equitable rate, which is as far as this objection goes, and the remission of such tolls, or their collection coupled with their repayment in the form of a subsidy.

The exemption of the coastwise trade from tolls, or the refunding of tolls collected from the coastwise trade, is merely a subsidy granted by the United States to that trade, and the loss resulting from not collecting, or from refunding those tolls, will fall solely upon the United States. In the same way the loss will fall on the United States if the tolls fixed by the President's proclamation on all vessels represent less than the fair value of the service rendered, which must necessarily be the case for many years; and the United States will, therefore, be in the position of subsidizing or siding not merely its own coastwise vessels, but foreign vessels as well.

Apart from the particular objections above considered, it is not understood that Sir Edward Grey questions the right of the United States to subsidize either its coastwise or its foreign shipping, inasmuch as he says that His Majesty's Government do not find "either in the letter or in the spirit of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty any surrender by either of the contracting powers of the right to encourage its shipping or its commerce by such subsidies as it may deem expedient."

To summarize the whole matter: The British objections are, in the first place, about the canal act only; but the canal act does not fix the tolls. They ignore the President's proclamation fixing the tolls, which puts at rest practically all of the suppositious injustice and inequality which Sir Edward Grey thinks might follow the administration of the act, and concerning which he expresses so many and grave fears. Moreover, the gravamen of the complaint is not that the canal act will actually injure in its operation British shipping or destroy rights claimed for such shipping under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, but that such injury or destruction may possibly be the effect thereof; and further, and more particularly, Sir Edward Grey complains that the action of Congress in enacting the legislation under discussion foreshadows that Congress or the President may hereafter take some action which might be injurious to British shipping and destructive of its rights under the treaty. Concerning this possible future injury, it is only necessary to say that in the absence of an allegation of actual or certainly impending injury, there appears nothing upon which to base a sound complaint. Concerning the infringement of rights claimed by Great Britain, it may be remarked that it would, of course, be idle to contend that Congress has not the power, or that the President properly authorized by Congress may not have the power to violate the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in its aspect as a rule of municipal law. Obviously, however, the fact that Congress has the power to do something contrary to the welfare of British shipping or that Congress has put or may put into the hands of the President the power to do something which may be contrary to the interests possessed by British shipping affords no just ground for complaint. It is the improper exercise of a power and not its possession which alone can give rise to an international cause of action; or to put it in terms of municipal law, it is not the possession of the power to trespass upon another's property which gives a right of action in trespass, but only the actual exercise of that power in committing the act of trespass itself.

When, and if, complaint is made by Great Britain that the effect of the act and the proclamation together will be to subject British vessels as a matter of fact to inequality of treatment, or to unjust and inequitable tolls in conflict with the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, the question will then be raised as to whether the United States is bound by that treaty both to take into account and to collect tolls from American vessels, and also whether under the obligations of that treaty British vessels are entitled to equality of treatment in all respects with the vessels of the United States. Until these objections rest upon something more substantial than mere possibility, it is not believed that they should be submitted to arbitration. The existence of an arbitration treaty does not create a right of action; it merely provides a means of settlement to be resorted to only when other resources of diplomacy have failed. It is not now deemed necessary, therefore, to enter upon a discussion of the views entertained by Congress and by the President as to the meaning of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in relation to questions of fact which have not yet arisen, but may possibly arise in the future in connection with the administration of the act under consideration.

It is recognized by this Government that the situation developed by the present discussion may require an examination by Great Britain into the facts above set forth as to the basis upon which the tolls fixed by the President's proclamation have been computed, and also into the regulations and restrictions circumscribing the coastwise trade of the United States, as well as into other facts bearing upon the situation, with the view of determining whether or not, as a matter of fact, under present conditions there is any ground for claiming that the act and proclamation actually subject British vessels to inequality of treatment, or to unjust and inequitable tolls.

If it should be found as a result of such an examination on the part of Great Britain that a difference of opinion exists between the two Governments on any of the important questions of fact involved in this discussion, then a situation will have arisen, which, in the opinion of this Government, could with advantage be dealt with by referring the controversy to a commission of inquiry for examination and report, in the manner provided for in the unratified arbitration treaty of August 3, 1911, between the United States and Great Britain.

The necessity for inquiring into questions of fact in their relation to controversies under diplomatic discussion was contemplated by both parties in negotiating that treaty, which provides for the institution, as occasion arises, of a joint high commission of inquiry, to which, upon the request of either party, might be referred for impartial and conscientious investigation any controversy between them, the commission being authorized upon such reference "to examine into and report upon the particular questions or matters referred to it, for the purpose of facilitating the solution of disputes by elucidating the facts, and to define the issues presented by such questions, and also to include in its report such recommendations and conclusions as may be appropriate."

This proposal might be carried out, should occasion arise for adopting it, either under a special agreement, or under the unratified arbitration treaty above mentioned, if Great Britain is prepared to join in ratifying that treaty, which the United States is prepared to do.

You will take an early opportunity to read this dispatch to Sir Edward Grey; and if he should so desire, you will leave a copy of it with him.

I am, sir, your obedient servant, P. C. KNOX.

Chargé d'Affaires Innes to the Secretary of State.

BRITISH EMBASSY,
Kineo, Me., July 8, 1912.

SIR: The attention of His Majesty's Government has been called to the various proposals that have from time to time been made for the purpose of relieving American shipping from the burden of the tolls to be levied on vessels passing through the Panama Canal, and these proposals, together with the arguments that have been used to support them, have been carefully considered with a view to the bearing on them of the provisions of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain of November 18, 1901.

The proposals may be summed up as follows:

(1) To exempt all American shipping from the tolls;
(2) To refund to all American ships the tolls which they may have paid;
(3) To exempt American ships engaged in the coastwise trade; and
(4) To repay the tolls to American ships engaged in the coastwise trade.

The proposal to exempt all American shipping from the payment of the tolls would, in the opinion of His Majesty's Government, involve an infraction of the treaty, nor is there, in their opinion, any difference in principle between charging tolls only to refund them and remitting tolls altogether. The result is the same in either case, and the adoption of the alternative method of refunding the tolls in preference to that of remitting them, while perhaps complying with the letter of the treaty, would still contravene its spirit.

It has been argued that a refund of the tolls would merely be equivalent to a subsidy and that there is nothing in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty which limits the right of the United States to subsidize its shipping. It is true that there is nothing in that treaty to prevent the United States from subsidizing its shipping and if it granted a subsidy His Majesty's Government could not be in a position to complain. But there is a great distinction between a general subsidy, either to shipping at large or to shipping engaged in any given trade, and a subsidy calculated particularly with reference to the amount of user of the canal by the subsidized lines or vessels. If such a subsidy were granted, it would not, in the opinion of His Majesty's Government, be in accordance with the obligations of the treaty.

As to the proposal that exemption shall be given to vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, a more difficult question arises. If the trade should be so regulated as to make it certain that only bona-fide coastwise traffic which is reserved for United States vessels would be benefited by this exemption it may be that no objection could be taken. But it appears to my government that it would be impossible to frame regulations which would prevent the exemption from resulting, in fact, in a preference to United States shipping and consequently in an infraction of the treaty.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, sir,
Your most obedient, humble servant,

A. MITCHELL INNES.

The secretary of state for foreign affairs of Great Britain to Ambassador Bryce.

FOREIGN OFFICE, November 14, 1912.

SIR: Your excellency will remember that on the 8th July, 1912, Mr. Mitchell Innes communicated to the Secretary of State the objections which His Majesty's Government entertained to the legislation relating to the Panama Canal, which was then under discussion in Congress, and that on the 27th August, after the passing of the Panama Canal Act and the issue of the President's memorandum on signing it, he informed Mr. Knox that when His Majesty's Government had had time to consider fully the act and the memorandum a further communication would be made to him.

Since that date the text of the act and the memorandum of the President have received attentive consideration at the hands of His Majesty's Government. A careful study of the President's memorandum has convinced me that he has not fully appreciated the British point of view and has misunderstood Mr. Mitchell Innes's note of the 8th July. The President argues upon the assumption that it is the intention of His Majesty's Government to place upon the Hay-Pauncefote treaty an interpretation which would prevent the United States from granting subsidies to their own shipping passing through the canal, and which would place them at a disadvantage as compared with other nations. This is not the case. His Majesty's Government regard equality of all nations as the fundamental principle underlying the treaty of 1901 in the same way that it was the basis of the Suez Canal convention of 1888, and they do not seek to deprive the United States of any liberty which is open either to themselves or to any other nation; nor do they find either in the letter or in the spirit of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty any surrender by either of the contracting powers of the right to encourage its shipping or its commerce by such subsidies as it may deem expedient.

The terms of the President's memorandum render it essential that I should explain in some detail the view which His Majesty's Government take as to what is the proper interpretation of the treaty, so as to indicate the limitations which they consider it imposes upon the freedom of action of the United States, and the points in which the Panama Canal Act as enacted infringes what His Majesty's Government hold to be their treaty rights.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty does not stand alone; it was the corollary of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850. The earlier treaty was, no doubt, superseded by it, but its general principle, as embodied in article 8, was not to be impaired. The object of the later treaty is clearly shown by its preamble. It was "to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by whatever route may be deemed expedient, and to that end to remove any obstruction which may arise out of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the general principle of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention." It was upon that footing, and upon that footing alone, that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was superseded.

Under that treaty both parties had agreed not to obtain any exclusive control over the contemplated ship canal, but the importance of the great project was fully recognized, and therefore the construction of the canal by others was to be encouraged, and the canal when completed was to enjoy a special measure of protection on the part of both the contracting parties.

Under article 8 the two powers declared their desire in entering into the convention not only to accomplish a particular object but also to establish a general principle, and therefore agreed to extend their protection to any practicable transisthmian communication, either by canal or railway, and either at Tehuantepec or Panama, provided that those who constructed it should impose no other charges or conditions of traffic than the two Governments should consider just and equitable, and that the canal or railway, "being open to the subjects and citizens of Great Britain and the United States on equal terms, should also be open to the subjects of any other State which was willing to join in the guaranty of joint protection."

So long as the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was in force, therefore, the position was that both parties to it had given up their power of independent action, because neither was at liberty itself to construct the canal, and thereby obtain the exclusive control which such construction would confer. It is also clear that if the canal had been constructed while the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was in force it would have been open, in accordance with article 8, to British and United States ships on equal terms, and equally clear, therefore, that the tolls leviable on such ships would have been identical.

The purpose of the United States in negotiating the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was to recover their freedom of action and obtain the right, which they had surrendered, to construct the canal themselves. This is expressed in the preamble to the treaty, but the complete liberty of action consequential upon such construction was to be limited by the maintenance of the general principle embodied in article 8 of the earlier treaty. That principle, as shown above, was one of equal treatment for both British and United States ships, and a study of the language of article 8 shows that the word "neutralization," in the preamble of the later treaty, is not there confined to belligerent operations but refers to the system of equal rights for which article 8 provides.

If the wording of the article is examined, it will be seen that there is no mention of belligerent action in it at all. Joint protection and equal treatment are the only matters alluded to, and it is to one or both of these that neutralization must refer. Such joint protection has always been understood by His Majesty's Government to be one of the results of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of which the United States was most anxious to get rid, and they can scarcely, therefore, believe that it was such joint protection that the United States were willing to keep alive and to which they referred in the preamble of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. It certainly was not the intention of His Majesty's Government that any responsibility for the protection of the canal should attach to them in the future. Neutralization must therefore refer to the system of equal rights.

It thus appears from the preamble that the intention of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was that the United States was to recover the right to construct the transisthmian canal upon the terms that when constructed the canal was to be open to British and United States ships on equal terms.

The situation created was in fact identical with that resulting from the boundary-waters treaty of 1909 between Great Britain and the United States, which provided as follows:

"The high contracting parties agree that the navigation of all navigable boundary waters shall forever continue free and open for the purposes of commerce to the inhabitants and to the ships, vessels, and boats of both countries equally, subject, however, to any laws and regulations of either country, within its own territory, not inconsistent with such privilege of free navigation, and applying equally and without discrimination to the inhabitants, ships, vessels, and boats of both countries.

"It is further agreed that so long as this treaty shall remain in force this same right of navigation shall extend to the waters of Lake Michigan and to all canals connecting boundary waters and now existing or which may hereafter be constructed on either side of the line. Either of the high contracting parties may adopt rules and regulations governing the use of such canals within its own territory and may charge tolls for the use thereof; but all such rules and regulations and all tolls charged shall apply alike to the subjects or citizens of the high contracting parties, and they * * * shall be placed on terms of equality in the use thereof."

A similar provision, though more restricted in its scope, appears in article 27 of the treaty of Washington, 1871, and Your Excellency will no doubt remember how strenuously the United States protested, as a violation of equal rights, against a system which Canada had introduced of a rebate of a large portion of the tolls on certain freight on the Welland Canal, provided that such freight was taken as far as Montreal, and how in the face of that protest the system was abandoned.

The principle of equality is repeated in article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which provides that the United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of the canal, certain rules, substantially as embodied in the Suez Canal convention. The first of these rules is that the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations observing the rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation.

The word "neutralization" is no doubt used in article 3 in the same sense as in the preamble, and implies subjection to the system of equal rights. The effect of the first rule is therefore to establish the provision, foreshadowed by the preamble and consequent on the maintenance of the principle of article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, that the canal is to be open to British and United States vessels on terms of entire equality. It also embodies a promise on the part of the United States that the ships of all nations which observe the rules will be admitted to similar privileges.

The President in his memorandum treats the words "all nations" as excluding the United States. He argues that, as the United States is constructing the canal at its own cost on territory ceded to it, it has, unless it has restricted itself, an absolute right of ownership and control, including the right to allow its own commerce the use of the canal upon such terms as it sees fit, and that the only question is whether it has by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty deprived itself of the exercise of the right to pass its own commerce free or remit tolls collected for the use of the canal. He argues that article 3 of the treaty is nothing more than a declaration of policy by the United States that the canal shall be neutral and all nations treated alike and no discrimination made against any one of them observing the rules adopted by the United States. "In other words, it was a conditional favored-nation treatment, the measure of which, in the absence of express stipulations to that effect, is not what the country gives to its own nationals, but the treatment it extends to other nations."

For the reasons they have given above His Majesty's Government believe this statement of the case to be wholly at variance with the real position. They consider that by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty the United States had surrendered the right to construct the canal, and that by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty they recovered that right upon the footing that the canal should be open to British and United States vessels upon terms of equal treatment.

The case can not be put more clearly than it was put by Mr. Hay himself, who, as Secretary of State, negotiated the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, in the full account of the negotiations which he sent to the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations (see S. Doc. 746, 61st Cong., 3d sess.):

"These rules are adopted in the treaty with Great Britain as a consideration for getting rid of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty."

If the rules set out in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty secure to Great Britain no more than most-favored-nation treatment, the value of the consideration given for superseding the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is not apparent to His Majesty's Government. Nor is it easy to see in what way the principle of article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which provides for equal treatment of British and United States ships, has been maintained.

I notice that in the course of the debate in the Senate on the Panama Canal bill the argument was used by one of the speakers that the third, fourth, and fifth rules embodied in article 3 of the treaty show that the words "all nations" can not include the United States, because if the United States were at war it is impossible to believe that it could be intended to be debarred by the treaty from using its own territory for revictualling its warships or landing troops.

The same point may strike others who read nothing but the text of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty itself, and I think it is therefore worth while that I should briefly show that this argument is not well founded.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901 aimed at carrying out the principle of the neutralization of the Panama Canal by subjecting it to the same régime as the Suez Canal. Rules 3, 4, and 5 of article 3 of the treaty are taken almost textually from articles 4, 5, and 6 of the Suez Canal convention of 1888. At the date of the signature of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty the territory on which the Isthmian Canal was to be constructed did not belong to the United States, consequently there was no need to insert in the draft treaty provisions corresponding to those in articles 10 and 13 of the Suez Canal convention, which preserve the sovereign rights of Turkey and of Egypt, and stipulate that articles 4 and 5 shall not affect the right of Turkey, as the local sovereign, and of Egypt, within the measure of her automony, to take such measures as may be necessary for securing the defense of Egypt and the maintenance of public order, and, in the case of Turkey, the defense of her possessions on the Red Sea.

Now that the United States has become the practical sovereign of the canal, His Majesty's Government do not question its title to exercise belligerent rights for its protection.

For these reasons His Majesty's Government maintain that the words "all nations" in rule 1 of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty include the United States, and that in consequence British vessels using the canal are entitled to equal treatment with those of the United States, and that the same tolls are chargeable on each.

This rule also provides that the tolls should be "just and equitable." The purpose of these words was to limit the tolls to the amount representing the fair value of the services rendered, i. e., to the interest on the capital expended and the cost of the operation and maintenance of the canal. Unless the whole volume of shipping which passes through the canal, and which all benefits equally by its services, is taken into account, there are no means of determining whether the tolls chargeable upon a vessel represent that vessel's fair proportion of the current expenditure properly chargeable against the canal—that is to say, interest on the capital expended in construction and the cost of operation and maintenance. If any classes of vessels are exempted from tolls in such a way that no receipts from such ships are taken into account in the income of the canal, there is no guaranty that the vessels upon which tolls are being levied are not being made to bear more than their fair share of the upkeep. Apart altogether, therefore, from the provision in rule 1 about equality of treatment for all nations, the stipulation that the tolls shall be just and equitable, when rightly understood, entitles His Majesty's Government to demand, on behalf of British shipping, that all vessels passing through the canal, whatever their flag or their character, shall be taken into account in fixing the amount of the tolls.

The result is that any system by which particular vessels or classes of vessels were exempted from the payment of tolls would not comply with the stipulations of the treaty that the canal should be open on terms of entire equality and that the charges should be just and equitable.

The President, in his memorandum, argues that if there is no difference, as stated in Mr. Mitchell Innes's note of the 8th July, between charging tolls only to refund them and remitting tolls altogether, the effect is to prevent the United States from aiding its own commerce in the way that all other nations may freely do. This is not so. His Majesty's Government have no desire to place upon the Hay-Pauncefote treaty an interpretation which would impose upon the United States any restriction from which other nations are free, or reserve to such other nation any privilege which is denied to the United States. Equal treatment, as specified in the treaty, is all they claim.

His Majesty's Government do not question the right of the United States to grant subsidies to United States shipping generally, or to any particular branches of that shipping; but it does not follow, therefore, that the United States may not be debarred by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty from granting a subsidy to certain shipping in a particular way, if the effect of the method chosen for granting such subsidy would be to impose upon British or other foreign shipping an unfair share of the burden of the upkeep of the canal or to create a discrimination in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise to prejudice rights secured to British shipping by this treaty.

If the United States exempt certain classes of ships from the payment of tolls, the result would be a form of subsidy to those vessels which His Majesty's Government consider the United States are debarred by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty from making.

It remains to consider whether the Panama Canal act, in its present form, conflicts with the treaty rights to which His Majesty's Government maintain they are entitled.

Under section 5 of the act the President is given, within certain defined limits, the right to fix the tolls, but no tolls are to be levied upon ships engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States, and the tolls, when based upon net registered tonnage for ships of commerce, are not to exceed $1.25 per net registered ton, nor be less, other than for vessels of the United States and its citizens, than the estimated proportionate cost of the actual maintenance and operation of the canal. There is also an exception for the exemptions granted by article 19 of the convention with Panama of 1903.

The effect of these provisions is that vessels engaged in the coastwise trade will contribute nothing to the upkeep of the canal. Similarly vessels belonging to the Government of the Republic of Panama will, in pursuance of the treaty of 1903, contribute nothing to the upkeep of the canal. Again, in the cases where tolls are levied, the tolls in the case of ships belonging to the United States and its citizens may be fixed at a lower rate than in the case of foreign ships, and may be less than the estimated proportionate cost of the actual maintenance and operation of the canal.

These provisions (1) clearly conflict with the rule embodied in the principle established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of equal treatment for British and United States ships, and (2) would enable tolls to be fixed which would not be just and equitable, and would therefore not comply with rule 1 of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

It has been argued that as the coastwse trade of the United States is confined by law to United States vessels, the exemption of vessels engaged in it from the payment of tolls can not injure the interests of foreign nations. It is clear, however, that the interests of foreign nations will be seriously injured in two material respects.

In the first place, the exemption will result in the cost of the working of the canal being borne wholly by foreign-going vessels, and on such vessels, therefore, will fall the whole burden of raising the revenue necessary to cover the cost of working and maintaining the canal. The possibility, therefore, of fixing the toll on such vessels at a lower figure than $1.25 per ton, or of reducing the rate below that figure at some future time, will be considerably lessened by the exemption.

In the second place, the exemption will, in the opinion of His Majesty's Government, be a violation of the equal treatment secured by the treaty, as it will put the "coastwise trade" in a preferential position as regards other shipping. Coastwise trade can not be circumscribed so completely that benefits conferred upon it will not affect vessels engaged in the foreign trade. To take an example, if cargo intended for an United States port beyond the canal, either from east or west, and shipped on board a foreign ship could be sent to its destination more cheaply, through the operation of the proposed exemption, by being landed at an United States port before reaching the canal, and then sent on as coastwise trade, shippers would benefit by adopting this course in preference to sending the goods direct to their destination through the canal on board the foreign ship.

Again, although certain privileges are granted to vessels engaged in an exclusively coastwise trade, His Majesty's Government are given to understand that there is nothing in the laws of the United States which prevents any United States ship from combining foreign commerce with coastwise trade, and consequently from entering into direct competition with foreign vessels while remaining "prima facie" entitled to the privilege of free passage through the canal. Moreover any restriction which may be deemed to be now applicable might at any time be removed by legislation or even perhaps by mere changes in the regulations.

In these and in other ways foreign shipping would be seriously handicapped, and any adverse result would fall more severely on British shipping than on that of any other nationality.

The volume of British shipping which will use the canal will in all probability be very large. Its opening will shorten by many thousands of miles the waterways between England and other portions of the British Empire, and if on the one hand it is important to the United States to encourage its mercantile marine and establish competition between coastwise traffic and transcontinental railways, it is equally important to Great Britain to secure to its shipping that just and impartial treatment to which it is entitled by treaty, and in return for a promise of which it surrendered the rights which it held under the earlier convention.

There are other provisions of the Panama Canal act to which the attention of His Majesty's Government has been directed. These are contained in section 11, part of which enacts that a railway company, subject to the interstate commerce act 1887, is prohibited from having any interest in vessels operated through the canal with which such railways may compete, and another part provides that a vessel permitted to engage in the coastwise or foreign trade of the United States is not allowed to use the canal if its owner is guilty of violating the Sherman Antitrust Act.

His Majesty's Government do not read this section of the act as applying to, or affecting, British ships, and they therefore do not feel justified in making any observations upon it. They assume that it applies only to vessels flying the flag of the United States, and that it is aimed at practices which concern only the internal trade of the United States. If this view is mistaken and the provisions are intended to apply under any circumstances to British ships, they must reserve their right to examine the matter further and to raise such contentions as may seem justified.

His Majesty's Government feel no doubt as to the correctness of their interpretation of the treaties of 1850 and 1901 and as to the validity of the rights they claim under them for British shipping; nor does there seem to them to be any room for doubt that the provisions of the Panama Canal act as to tolls conflict with the rights secured to their shipping by the treaty. But they recognize that many persons of note in the United States, whose opinions are entitled to great weight, hold that the provisions of the act do not infringe the conventional obligations by which the United States is bound, and under these circumstances they desire to state their perfect readiness to submit the question to arbitration if the Government of the United States would prefer to take this course. A reference to arbitration would be rendered unnecessary if the Government of the United States should be prepared to take such steps as would remove the objections to the act which His Majesty's Government have stated.

Knowing as I do full well the interest which this great undertaking has aroused in the New World and the emotion with which its opening is looked forward to by United States citizens, I wish to add before closing this dispatch that it is only with great reluctance that His Majesty's Government have felt bound to raise objection on the ground of treaty rights to the provisions of the act. Animated by an earnest desire to avoid points which might in any way prove embarrassing to the United States, His Majesty's Government have confined their objections within the narrowest possible limits, and have recognized in the fullest manner the right of the United States to control the canal. They feel convinced that they may look with confidence to the Government of the United States to insure that in promoting the interests of United States shipping nothing will be done to impair the safeguards guaranteed to British shipping by treaty.

Your excellency will read this dispatch to the Secretary of State and will leave with him a copy.

I am, etc.,

E. GREY.

[Panama Canal toll rates.]

A proclamation by the President of the United States of America.

I, William Howard Taft, President of the United States of America, by virtue of the power and authority vested in me by the act of Congress approved August 24, 1912, to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone, do hereby prescribe and proclaim the following rates of toll to be paid by vessels using the Panama Canal:

"1. On merchant vessels carrying passengers or cargo, $1.20 per net vessel ton—each 100 cubic feet—of actual earning capacity.

"2. On vessels in ballast without passengers or cargo, 40 per cent less than the rate of tolls for vessels with passengers or cargo.

"3. Upon naval vessels other than transports, colliers, hospital ships, and supply ships, 50 cents per displacement ton.

"4. Upon army and navy transports, colliers, hospital ships, and supply ships, $1.20 per net ton, the vessels to be measured by the same rules as are employed in determining the net tonnage of merchant vessels."

The Secretary of War will prepare and prescribe such rules for the measurement of vessels and such regulations as may be necessary and proper to carry this proclamation into full force and effect.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington this 13th day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and twelve and of the Independence of the United States the one hundred and thirty-seventh.

[SEAL.] WM. H. TAFT.

By the President:

P. C. KNOX, Secretary of State.

[House Document No. 1313, Sixty-second Congress, third session.]

ARTICLE PREPARED BY THE LAW OFFICER OF THE ISTHMIAN CANAL COMMISSION, MR. FEUILLE, REGARDING TOLLS ON THE PANAMA CANAL.

The provision of the Panama Canal act, recently enacted by Congress, which discriminates in favor of American coastwise shipping and the vessels of the Republic of Panama, has brought forth a protest from the British Government and unfavorable comment from the press at home and abroad.

It is claimed that the United States have violated treaty obligations in exempting American ships from toll charges at the canal; that, in consenting to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, Great Britain surrendered valuable rights held by her under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty; that without the Hay-Pauncefote treaty the United States could not build and maintain the canal alone, and that the surrender of her rights under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty constituted a valid consideration entitling Great Britain to equal treatment for her ships with those of the United States at the canal. The question is an historical one to some extent. It might be well to refer briefly to the history of the subject.

In 1850 the United States and Great Britain entered into an agreement, commonly known as the Clayton-Bulwer convention, to promote the building of a canal by the Nicaraguan route, and, when constructed, to jointly protect it against unjust detention, confiscation, seizure, or any violation whatsoever. The contracting parties also agreed that neither would erect fortifications at the canal or its vicinity, and that neither would directly or indirectly obtain the exclusive benefit of the canal or assume or exercise any dominion over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito coast, or any part of Central America. The Mosquito coast, over which Great Britain was then attempting to exercise jurisdiction, is situated in the vicinity of the Atlantic entrance of the proposed Nicaraguan canal.

The United States had two purposes in view in making the convention—to stop Great Britain's encroachment upon Central American territory and to remove the obstruction at the Atlantic entrance of the canal resulting from the English assumption of jurisdiction over the Mosquito coast.

One of the important provisions of the treaty was that prohibiting any discrimination in the use of the canal in favor of either of the contracting parties as against the other. The point is covered in the following explicit language:

"The Governments of the United States and Great Britain hereby declare that neither the one nor the other will ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the ship canal. * * * nor will the United States or Great Britain take advantage of any intimacy, or use any alliance, connection, or influence that either may possess with any State or Government through whose territory the said canal may pass for the purpose of acquiring or holding, directly or indirectly, for the citizens or subjects of the one any rights or advantages in regard to commerce or navigation through the said canal which shall not be offered on the same terms to the citizens or subjects of the other."

There are other provisions to the same effect in the treaty. It is significant that the explicit language of the Clayton-Bulwer convention in respect to equality of treatment of the contracting parties was not employed in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. This will be discussed later on in this paper.

The convention applied to the Nicaraguan route and to Central America and not to the Panama route or South America, of which the Isthmus of Panama forms a part.

It is true that article 8 of the treaty did obligate the parties to extend their protection by treaty stipulations to the Panama route or the Tehuantepec route, but no such treaty stipulations were ever effected.

Inasmuch as article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention is referred to in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, it might be well to quote it here at length:

"ART. 8. The Governments of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired, in entering into this convention, to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection, by treaty stipulations, to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway, across the Isthmus which connects North and South America, and especially to the interoceanic communications, should the same prove to be practicable, whether by canal or railway, which are now proposed to be established by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama. In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways as are by this article specified, it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford."

When the Clayton-Bulwer convention was made the United States was under treaty obligations with New Granada, now Colombia, to guarantee positively and efficaciously to that Government the perfect neutrality of the Isthmus of Panama, with the view that the free transit from one to the other sea might not be interrupted or embarrassed while the treaty existed, and in consequence the United States also guaranteed in the same manner the rights of sovereignty and property which New Granada possessed over said territory. In other words, the United States was exercising a protectorate over the Isthmus of Panama in 1850, when the Clayton-Bulwer convention was made. In return for the protection afforded the Government of New Granada, the United States were to enjoy all the exemptions, privileges, and immunities concerning commerce and navigation which then or thereafter might be enjoyed by Granadian citizens, their vessels, and merchandise; and this equality of favors was to extend to the passengers, correspondence, and merchandise of the United States in their transit across the said territory from one sea to the other upon any means of communication established or to be established.

The Clayton-Bulwer convention did not impair the treaty between the United States and New Granada. Doubtless the existence of the latter treaty caused article 8 to be inserted in the Clayton-Bulwer convention, so that by further treaty stipulations that convention could be made extensive to Panama with the consent of New Granada. Without a material modification of the treaty with the latter country, the Clayton-Bulwer convention could not have been applied to Panama.

However, no treaty stipulations for the extension of the Clayton-Bulwer convention to the Panama Canal were ever effected, and therefore that convention only applied to the Nicaraguan route and Central America.

The Clayton-Bulwer convention remained in existence for 51 years, that is to say, from 1850 to 1901, when it was superseded by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and in all that time nothing of consequence was done by Great Britain to promote the construction of the canal. Hence, the claim that the Clayton-Bulwer convention had become obsolete has some merit.

No one familiar with the trend of public opinion in the United States but knows that the American people had concluded to build the canal independently of any other nation when the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was made, and had not that treaty been entered into there is no doubt that the moribund convention of 1850 would have been abrogated by our Government in response to popular demand.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty, made in 1901, did not affect the treaty made between the United States and New Granada, or Colombia, as it is now called, respecting the Isthmus of Panama. Hence, the United States, without interruption, has been under treaty obligations since 1846 to protect the Panama route and to maintain the neutrality of transit over the Isthmus. Neither the Clayton-Bulwer convention nor the Hay-Pauncefote treaty relieved the United States of the burden; and the preferential treatment accorded to the commerce of the United States across the Isthmus of Panama, in compensation for that burden, was not diminished or impaired by either of the conventions between England and the United States above mentioned. The right held by the United States under the Colombian treaty was equivalent to an easement over the Isthmus of Panama, and this easement ripened into a fee simple title when the treaty with Panama was made in 1903. Whence comes England's right to claim equal treatment with the United States at the Isthmus? She did not get it under the Clayton-Bulwer convention, nor by virtue of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The treaty between the United States and Panama added nothing to England's rights under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The Clayton-Bulwer convention and the Hay-Pauncefote treaty left the status at the Isthmus unchanged under which the United States held special commercial privileges over that territory. That the United States are now the owners of the territory, instead of being the holders of an easement, can not change the status. Hence the United States now have rights, commercial and otherwise, at the Isthmus superior to those of England, as they have had since 1846.

It is claimed by Great Britain that the consideration for superseding the Clayton-Bulwer convention was to secure equality of treatment for her ships with those of the United States at the canal. There is no such consideration expressed in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty nor in the correspondence between the two Governments leading to the making of that treaty; nor does such a consideration arise by implication from a correct reading of the instrument. But a fair construction of it would permit of the suggestion that England's prime motive was to obtain the use of a shorter route to the Pacific through a canal built without cost to her and the neutrality of which was to be maintained by the United States singly and alone. If Great Britain's contentions were correct, the benefit to the United States from the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer convention would not be apparent. The English contention means that the United States renounced all benefits under the Clayton-Bulwer convention and yet retained the burdens and obligations of that instrument, not only in respect to England, but the other nations of the world as well, although they were not parties to the convention; and these burdens must be assumed in regard to a canal over which the Clayton-Bulwer convention could not have been extended without further treaty stipulations with New Granada as a party. Surely the burden is upon the party asserting such a claim to establish it by satisfactory evidence beyond doubt.

If the claim of Great Britain is conceded, that she surrendered certain rights in respect to the Nicaraguan Canal when she consented to the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer convention, she in turn was relieved of the joint obligation to promote the building of the canal and to protect it and maintain its neutrality when built. It is fair to assume that the latter compensated for the former. Be that as it may, Great Britain agreed to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and that treaty superseded the Clayton-Bulwer convention.

But Great Britain will receive other considerations of incalculable value to her for agreeing to the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer convention. Her tonnage in steam and sailing vessels is greater than that of the other maritime nations combined. It is not unfair to Great Britain to say that the relative advantage to come to her from the opening of the canal will be in like proportion; and her great superiority over the other nations in tonnage will give here a most favored position in the trade with the west coast of this hemisphere.

She has great possessions in Asia and Australia and other parts of Oceania; the Panama Canal will give her another highway to reach them.

The benefits to come to her from the canal will not stop here. We know that British America is larger than the United States, excluding Alaska, and British Columbia in the western part of Canada contains vast lumber regions and immense wheat fields which are just beginning to be developed. The opening of the canal will turn immigration toward the Canadian Pacific, and the future should bring a flourishing trade between that region and Great Britain in the exchange of manufactures for Canadian wheat and lumber.

But these are not all the advantages which England will obtain from the canal. Canada has hundreds of miles of coast on the Atlantic and three or four hundred miles of coast on the Pacific, and is traversed by transcontinental railroads. These conditions will make British America a most valuable base for the operations of the English Navy in both oceans when the canal is built, and thus the efficiency of England's Navy will be increased almost equally with our own.

These are some of the benefits that England is to receive from the canal. It is fair to assume that she considered them sufficient to compensate her for agreeing to the abrogation of the almost-forgotten Clayton-Bulwer convention, so that there might be no obstacle to the building of the canal by the United States. Were the Panama Canal project abandoned at this time England would probably be injured by the abandonment as much as the United States; and yet the burden of building the canal and of maintaining its neutrality thereafter is entirely on the United States. England has no obligations in that respect.

However, if we are under treaty obligations to treat England's ships on an equality with our own at the canal, it is our duty to respect them. But have we assumed such obligations? An answer to the question depends on the meaning of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The treaty was made in Washington on the 19th day of November, 1901. Its purpose, as declared in the preamble, was to remove any objection which might arise out of the convention of April 19, 1850, known as the Clayton-Bulwer convention, to the construction of the canal under the auspices of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established under article 8 of that convention. The articles of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty are so interdependent that it is necessary to construe them together in order to get at the true meaning of the instrument, and for that purpose they are here set out in full:

"ARTICLE 1. The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th of April, 1850.

"ART. 2. It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost, or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscription or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

"ART. 3. The United States adopts, as the basis of neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th day of October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal, that is to say:

"1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

"2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

"3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service. Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of belligerents.

"4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

"5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal, within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

"6. The plant, establishment, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be a part thereof, for the purposes of this treaty, and in time of war as in time of peace shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

"ART. 4. It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the aforementioned canal shall affect the general principles of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty."

Those articles contain all the material provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

The declaration in the preamble of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty that it is not intended to impair the general principle of neutralization established by article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention has been urged against any proposition to favor American ships at the canal.

The argument is based on the assumption that the terms "general principle of neutralization" used in the preamble include traffic conditions within their scope and meaning. But the assumption is not justified. They mean immunity from attack and nothing else. It is true the article in question does provide that the canal shall be open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, but that was simply a statement of the consideration to each of the two contracting parties for the protection they were to extend to the canal. There are two separate elements expressed in the article—one, the protection of the canal, and the other the equality of treatment of the contracting parties in return for that protection.

The general principle which the parties desired to extend to the Panama route was one of protection; that is to say, neutralization. That proposition is expressed in the first sentence of the article. The equality of treatment of the contracting parties is another thought expressing the consideration in return for the protection of the canal, and is found in the second sentence of the same article. The term "neutralization" is not employed by international law writers to mean equality of treatment in respect to traffic conditions. The evident purpose of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was to secure immunity from attack for the canal. No other meaning can be given to the word "neutralization."

The language of article 2 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is quite clear, and unless its terms are modified by some subsequent provisions of that treaty, it concedes to the United States the enjoyment of all of the rights incident to the construction of the canal, as well as the exclusive right for the regulation and management of the same. Is there any provision in the treaty which modifies article 2? It will be noted that the provisions relating to neutrality provided for in the Clayton-Bulwer convention are announced therein by the United States and Great Britain jointly, while in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty the United States alone establishes the rules. The partnership arrangement existing between the two countries under the Clayton-Bulwer convention has terminated, and the rules for the neutralization of the canal under the later treaty were enacted by the United States and must be maintained by that Government alone. Those rules are to be observed by other nations, and not by the United States. If this statement is true, then the rule of equality does not apply to the United States.

Great Britain's contention is that rule 1 does apply to the United States, and that, in effect, would be reading into the rule the words

"with the vessels of the United States," so that the language of the rule then would be as follows:

"The canal shall be free and open to vessels of commerce and war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality with the vessels of the United States."

We do not believe that any such construction can be given to rule 1 if read in the light of the other provisions of the treaty.

The language of article 2 is very clear and affirmative:

"The United States shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to the construction of the canal, as well as the exclusive right of providing for its regulation and management."

These words can not be limited or impaired by implication. It requires an express provision in the treaty to minimize their effect, and none such can be found therein.

The claim now advanced by Great Britain is confined to the subject of canal tolls, but with equal propriety it might include all benefits given to American vessels of war or commerce at the canal. The rule of equality is not limited to canal tolls, but relates to any discrimination in respect to the charges or conditions of traffic or otherwise, and includes vessels of war and vessels of commerce. Consequently, no favors could be shown to our warships in the use of dry docks, anchorage basins, pilotage, coaling privileges, commissaries, and other conveniences at the canal without extending like privileges to foreign war vessels.

Those who denied our right to fortify the canal relied on the broad language of the rule to sustain their contention, and if England's claim in respect to tolls is correct it would seem that the objection made to our fortifying the canal would be equally well taken. If the rule of equality places American ships on the same basis with foreign ships, then our belligerent vessels will not be authorized to revictual or taken any stores in the canal except when strictly necessary, and all the other rules restricting the use of the canal by belligerents will apply to us. However, that doctrine has not been admitted by the people of the United States, and, for that matter, England has recognized our right to fortify the canal and to do anything necessary to protect it, and that carries with it an admission of a superior right in our warships to the use of the canal.

The British protest assumes that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty did not admit of the United States protecting the territory on which the canal was to be built because the United States was not then the owner of it. The protest overlooks the important fact that at that very time the United States was under treaty obligation with Colombia to maintain the neutrality of the Isthmus and to guarantee the sovereignty right of that country therein, and that treaty obligation was not diminished in any respect by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Again, when the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was first submitted to the Senate it contained a provision to prohibit the United States from fortifying the canal. The Senate rejected the provision, and England accepted the treaty with the provision eliminated. In discussing the elimination of that provision, Lord Lansdowne, in a memorandum dated August 3, 1901, used this language:

"In my dispatch I pointed out the dangers of a construction in which one clause permitted the adoption of defensive measures while another prohibited the erection of fortifications. It is most important that no doubt should exist as to the intention of the contracting parties. As to this, I understand that by the omission of all reference to the matter of defense the United States desires to reserve the power to protect the canal at any time, when the United States may be at war, from destruction or damage at the hands of an enemy or enemies. On the other hand, I conclude that, with the above exception, there is no intention to derogate from the principles of neutrality laid down by the rules. As to the first of these propositions, I am not prepared to deny that contingencies may arise, when, not only from a national point of view, but in behalf of the commercial interests of the whole world, it might be of supreme importance to the United States that they should be free to adopt measures for the defense of the canal at a moment when they were themselves engaged in hostilities.

"It is also to be borne in mind that owing to the omission of the words under which this country became jointly bound to defend the neutrality of the canal, and the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, the obligations of Great Britain will be materially diminished."

Thus we see that the attempt to make the rules of neutrality applicable to the United States was without success. So that our right to fortify the canal may be said to be well established, and the right to fortify carries with it the further right to use the canal with our belligerent ships when necessary to prevent hostile fleets or armies from entering the canal. If ships of war and of commerce of other nations have an equal right with those of the United States in the matter of tolls it would be difficult for our Government to maintain that our belligerent ships have more rights in the canal than those of any other belligerent. Inasmuch as the burden of maintaining the neutrality of the canal is upon the United States alone it follows that our warships are not within the rule of equality laid down in rule 1, and that being so, it would be playing fast and loose with the rule to include our commercial vessels within its provisions and not do likewise with our vessels of war.

In discussing the belligerent rights of the United States at the canal, the British note of protest of November 14, 1912, says:

"Now that the United States has become the practical sovereign of the canal, His Majesty's Government do not question its title to exercise belligerent rights for its protection."

The writer of the protest does not seem to have had in mind the fact that the United States has been under treaty obligations since 1846 to protect the Isthmus and to maintain the neutrality of the transit across it, and that Lord Lansdowne, during the negotiations for the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, recognized, not only our right, but that it was our duty, to protect the canal. Were we so inclined, we might rest our case on the admission contained in the protest; that the acquisition by the United States of the territory over which the canal is being constructed was sufficient of itself to modify the treaty so as to afford belligerent rights to our warships. If the acquisition of the territory will thus benefit our war vessels, it is hard to conceive how equal favors to our vessels of commerce are to be withheld under such circumstances. At least one distinguished American diplomat has maintained that the acquisition by the United States of the canal strip did change the treaty status so as to authorize the exemption of American merchant ships from the payment of tolls. No doubt he will be pleased at discovering that Great Britain, in her protest, lends comfort to his views.

Viewed in the light of the circumstances and conditions attending the execution of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and construing rule 1 in connection with the other terms of the instrument, that rule simply amounts to what is known in treaties as "the most-favored-nation clause." In other words, the rule means that the nations observing the rules of neutralization laid down in the treaty by the United States shall be preferred in the use of the canal without discrimination in favor of one of such nations as against the other.

It has been said that language substantially the same as that of rule 1 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is employed in the treaty of Washington between the United States and Great Britain relating to the Canadian and American canals and the use of the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence River, and that discrimination in favor of the ships of either of the contracting parties is not allowed under the latter treaty. It is true that entire equality is observed in the treatment of vessels of the parties to the Washington treaty, but it is so because the treaty itself clearly and affirmatively prohibits a discrimination in favor of one of the parties as against the other. The statement that the language of the Washington treaty is substantially that of the Hay Pauncefote treaty is incorrect. Article 27 of the Washington treaty leaves nothing to inference, but expressly says that Great Britain will engage to urge upon the Canadian Government to secure to the citizens of the United States the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence, and other canals in the Dominion on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion; and the United States engages that the subjects of Great Britain shall enjoy the use of the St. Clair Flats Canal on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States, and engages to urge upon the State governments to secure to the subjects of Great Britain the use of the several State canals connected with the navigation of the lakes or rivers traversed by or contiguous to the boundary line between the possessions of the high contracting parties, on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States.

Here we have unequivocal declarations that there shall be equality of treatment between the contracting parties. There is no such declaration in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

It has also been said that the rule of equality as expressed in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is the same as that laid down in the Suez Canal convention. But again we say that the statement is not correct. Article I of the Suez convention reads as follows:

"The Suez Maritime Canal shall always be free and open, in time of war as in time of peace, to every vessel of commerce or of war without distinction of flag."

The words "without distinction of flag," which I have underscored, make the meaning quite clear that all nations shall stand upon an equal footing. There is no such language in rule 1 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

The correspondence between the United States and Great Britain leading up to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty throws much light on the subject. Rule 1 received the most serious consideration in the diplomatic negotiations preceding the adoption of the treaty, and that England's great solicitude was to secure for herself equal treatment with other nations appears from Lord Lansdowne's communication to Lord Pauncefote on October 23, 1901, on this subject, in which he said in part:

"I informed the United States chargé d'affaires to-day that His Majesty's Government had given their careful attention to the various amendments which have been suggested in the draft of the interoceanic canal treaty, communicated by Mr. Hay to your Lordship on the 25th of April last, and that I was now in a position to inform him officially of our views.

"Mr. Hay suggested that in article 3, rule 1, we should substitute for the words 'the canal shall be free and open to vessels of commerce and of war of all nations which shall agree to observe these rules, etc.' the words 'the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules,' and in the same clause, as a consequence of the amendment, substitute for the words 'any nation so agreeing' the words 'any such nation.' His Majesty's Government were prepared to accept this amendment, which seemed to us equally efficacious for the purpose which we had in view, namely, that of insuring that Great Britain should not be placed in a less advantageous position than any other power, while they stopped short of conferring upon other nations a contractual right to the use of the canal." (The italics are mine.)

The reasonable inference to be drawn from the language of the English negotiator is that he was seeking to obtain the most favored nation clause for Great Britain and nothing more. We must bear in mind that the Clayton-Bulwer convention contained provisions prohibiting the contracting parties from—

"Acquiring or holding, directly or indirectly, for the citizens or subjects of the one any rights or advantages in regard to commerce or navigation through the said canal which shall not be offered on the same terms to the subjects of the other."

The fact that no such language was employed or sought to be employed by Great Britain in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is significant, and would seem to support the conclusion that she only desired equal treatment with other nations, especially as she had assumed no obligation in respect to the canal that would not be expected of the other nations using it, that is to say, that none of them would do any act in the canal unfriendly to the United States. That obligation rests upon all civilized nations at peace with us without the necessity of a treaty.

But we need not leave our case here. It became necessary for the United States to enter into a treaty with the Republic of Panama to obtain the right of way across the Isthmus of Panama for the construction of the canal and political jurisdiction over the Canal Zone. In part consideration for the cession of the canal strip by the Republic of Panama, the United States agreed that the vessels of the Panaman Government should have free transportation over the canal at all times. This is a discrimination in favor of the vessels of Panama, inasmuch as no other nation has that privilege, but it is quite consistent with the most favored-nation clause.

The concession to the vessels of Panama, it is said, was necessary in order to acquire a right of way over which to build the canal and, in consequence, the privilege granted to Panama was proper and did not militate against the proposition that the United States must treat the vessels of all nations on terms of entire equality with their own vessels. The argument would create the anomalous situation in which Panama occupied a position superior to all nations, including the United States. In addition, the argument begs the question entirely. If Great Britain's claim is correct, the United States could not have made any such concession to Panaman vessels without violating the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and in order to keep within that treaty some other consideration would have had to be given to Panama in lieu of the exemption accorded to her ships.

But the concession to Panama is quite consistent with the most-favored-nation clause. That clause does not prevent the granting of a special privilege to another nation, provided a special consideration is given in return for the privilege. The most-favored-nation clause can not be understood to mean that a country should enjoy as a free gift that which is accorded to other nations for a full equivalent; that is to say, Great Britain, if she observes the rules of neutrality laid down in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, shall enjoy the canal on an equal footing with all other nations observing those rules, but the rule would be unequal as to Panama if she were required to surrender the Canal Zone to the United States besides having to observe the rules of neutrality. Hence, Panama is entitled to a free canal for her vessels, because she has given a special consideration for the privilege which the other nations have not. This doctrine has been generally recognized, and especially by Great Britain.

The United States entered into a commercial treaty with the Hawaiian Islands in 1876, by the terms of which mutual trade concessions were made by the two Governments. At that time Great Britain and Hawaii had a treaty containing the most-favored-nation clause. The British Government admitted that—

"as the advantages conceded to the United States by the Sandwich Islands are expressly stated to be given in consideration of and as an equivalent for certain reciprocal concessions on the part of the United States, Great Britain can not, as a matter of right, claim the same advantages for her trade under the strict letter of the treaty of 1851."

We do not find that Great Britain's consent was asked by the United States before the concession was made to Panaman vessels, nor does it appear that Great Britain made any protest. It is fair to assume that she recognized the right of the United States to extend the privilege of a free canal to Panamian vessels in return for the cession of the Canal Zone and jurisdiction over it to our Government. It would seem that England could not very well admit a right to the United States in this and yet contend for her present construction of rule 1—that English ships and those of other nations observing the rules are entitled to use the canal on terms of entire equality with those of the United States.

It is true that Great Britain now protests against the exemption of Panaman vessels, but this objection, coming as it does nine years after the making of the treaty, when the canal is almost completed, does not deserve serious consideration. The only purpose it can serve is that of demonstrating that England now recognizes that she can not concede our right to exempt Panaman vessels without surrendering her case.

We might pursue the most-favored-nation theory further. On January 9, 1900, the United States, Colombia, and Panama negotiated what was known as the tripartite agreement, by which the United States granted to Colombia the right to convey through the canal her troops, materials of war, and ships of war without paying any duty to the United States. The agreement was negotiated by our State Department with the executive departments of Colombia and Panama and was ratified by our Senate and the Assembly of Panama, but was rejected by the Congress of Colombia, and hence did not become effective. The exemption from the payment of duties at the canal in favor of Colombian vessels could have been made only upon the theory that rule 1 accords to England nothing more than most-favored-nation treatment. Although Great Britain protested against the exemption of Colombian ships, the protest does not seem to have been as insistent as the one she now presents. Notwithstanding the English protest made at the time, our State Department carried forward the agreement, our Senate ratified it, and it failed only because the Colombian Congress rejected it.

The issue now pending with England has had full consideration by the United States Government. Our State Department, in making the canal treaty with Panama and the tripartite agreement with Colombia and Panama, and the Senate in ratifying this convention, have demonstrated that the treaty-making power of the United States has not been in accord with the English view of the subject. And now the Congress of the United States has spoken out against Great Britain's claim and has enacted the Panama Canal act, by which American shipping and the vessels of the Government of Panama are favored at the canal.

We might still pursue the doctrine a little further—that the most-favored-nation clause does not preclude a Government from granting special concessions to other nations in return for special favors. Suppose the United States, with some other maritime power as an ally, were to engage in a war, would it be correct to say that we could not admit the belligerent ships of our ally into the canal on an equal footing with our vessels? The American people would hardly concede that, and it may well be doubted that Great Britain would admit it were she the ally.

The issue has been discussed in this paper as though the burden were upon the United States in the argument. As a matter of fact, the onus is on Great Britain to establish her contention. Great Britain, in effect, is claiming a servitude upon our property—the canal—and a limitation on our sovereignty. Her claim, if valid, means that we must tax our imports and exports and our coastwise trade passing through the canal equally with the trade of other countries using that waterway. That means a serious restriction upon the sovereign right of the United States to regulate their fiscal and economic policies as they may deem best. The restriction would amount to a limitation of our sovereignty, as well as a servitude imposed upon our territory.

It is a well-established rule of international law that one sovereign can not claim a servitude on the territory of another except by compact, and "if a dispute occurs between a territorial sovereign and a foreign power as to the extent or nature of rights enjoyed by the latter within the territory of the former, the presumption is against the foreign State, and upon it the burden lies of proving its claim beyond doubt or question."

In summing up the objections to the British claim we might say that the commercial advantages which the United States has at the Isthmus came from the treaty with Colombia of 1846, and not from the Clayton-Bulwer convention or the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and neither of these affected the rights so held by us; that the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, when properly construed, do not sustain it; that in abandoning the explicit language of the Clayton-Bulwer convention, which clearly prohibited a discrimination in favor of the United States, England lost her right to claim at this time equality with the United States in the use of the canal for her vessels; that Lord Lansdowne's communication of October 23, 1901, to Lord Pauncefote, already mentioned, tends to prove that England's only desire was to obtain equality of treatment with other powers for her vessels at the canal and nothing more; that the canal treaty with the Republic of Panama by which the vessels of the Republic are entitled to the free use of the canal, made without protest from Great Britain, is a strong circumstance in support of the proposition that rule 1 is nothing more than the most-favored-nation clause expressed in another form; and, lastly, Great Britain has not produced any sufficient proof to overcome the presumption arising against her from the circumstances just related; much less has she adduced any proof or argument to establish her claim beyond doubt or question.

Many of our citizens believe that the issue between Great Britain and the United States on the subject of canal tolls should be submitted to The Hague tribunal for determination under the provisions of the arbitration treaty between the two countries. This assumes that the question is a justiciable one. The treaty does not require all questions that may arise between the two countries to be submitted to The Hague. It does say that "differences which may arise of a legal nature or relating to the interpretation of treaties existing between the two contracting parties, and which it may not have been possible to settle by diplomacy, shall be referred to the permanent court of arbitration," etc. But the same clause of the treaty contains a proviso modifying the rule so laid down to the effect that neither of the parties is bound to submit questions affecting its vital interests, its independence, its honor, or the interests of third parties.

We have seen that the issue does affect the vital interests as well as the independence of the United States, inasmuch as the English claim imposes a limitation upon our sovereignty and a servitude on our territory, so as to materially impair our right to freely adopt such economic and fiscal policies as we may deem best, and we are not at liberty to use our own with freedom. The question is a vital one and of the most serious importance to the people of the United States, because all of the maritime powers of the world are equally interested with England in obtaining a decision adverse to the United States. And yet we are expected to submit the issue to a tribunal that is controlled by these same maritime powers.

It has been said that if the United States refused to submit the question to The Hague, the arbitration treaty may as well be destroyed. The answer to that is: If the question does, in fact, affect our vital interests or our independence, then there is no authority for its submission to that tribunal. The proviso which excludes such questions from the jurisdiction of The Hague is just as binding on the parties as any other part of the treaty, and the necessity for its observance is accentuated when the question is one in which the powers controlling the court are vitally interested. I do not intend to reflect on The Hague tribunal, but am simply stating the facts. In this instance the judges would also be parties at interest.

THE PANAMA CANAL—SHALL IT BE AMERICAN OR ANGLO-AMERICAN?

I commend an American canal, on American soil, to the American people. (Gen. Grant.)

The policy of this country is a canal under American control. The United States can not consent to surrender this control to any European power. (President Hayes.)

INTRODUCTION.

As early as 1550 the idea of a canal which should unite the waters of the Atlantic and of the Pacific was publicly discussed. From that time until the present idealists have dreamed and statesmen have struggled to bring about its realization. Difficulties—physical, financial, and political—have barred the pathway which led to achievement. The treaty which the United States made with the Republic of Panama removed the legal and political obstacles in the way of commencing the task which had been so long in contemplation. Since that time the United States has acted with characteristic energy. One of the greatest engineering achievements of mankind is being carried to a successful conclusion. The cost of the canal to the Government of the United States will exceed $400,000,000. In the near future vessels of commerce will pass through the canal from the Atlantic to the Pacific. It is estimated that within a year from the time it is opened a net tonnage of over 10,000,000 tons will use the canal. Of this tonnage, not quite one-quarter will be engaged in American coastwise trade. The Panama route will have a monopoly of the traffic of Hawaii and of the west coast of North and South America, with the exception of a small part of the trade of southern Chile, although it must compete with other routes for the large and valuable commerce of Pacific Asia and of Australia. The canal will decrease the distance from New York to San Francisco about 8,500 miles, and from New York to Australia about 4,000 miles. The saving in time for a vessel of 9 knots speed from New York to Iquique, Chile, one of the ports from which the heavy nitrate shipments are made, will be over 23 days. The trip from Liverpool to Iquique will be decreased nearly 3,000 miles. The saving of time and money which will result to those engaged in the world's commerce by the use of the Panama Canal can not be calculated.

The Panama Canal is the achievement of the United States alone. No other nation has aided in its creation. In August, 1912, the act of Congress making provision for the permanent government of the Canal Zone became a law. The law exempts coastwise trade from tolls. This comparatively unimportant provision and the provisions of the law which deny the right to use the canal to vessels owned by railway companies and those violating the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law have been made the basis of a formal protest by Great Britain on the ground that they are in conflict with the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. That protest raises questions of the utmost importance. The manner in which those questions shall be determined will profoundly affect the commercial development and national integrity of the United States.

THE HISTORY OF THE CANAL.

A brief history of the Panama Canal is essential to an understanding of the present controversy. In 1846 a treaty was entered into between the United States and Colombia, then called New Granada. The treaty gave to the United States a right of transit over the Isthmus of Panama "from the one to the other sea." The Panama Railroad, which was completed in 1855, was a result of this treaty. In 1849 the United States entered into a treaty with Nicaragua which provided for the construction of a ship canal from Greytown (San Juan) on the Atlantic coast to the Pacific coast by way of the Lake of Nicaragua. Great Britain, claiming a protectorate over the Mosquito Indians, in whose territory the Atlantic end would be placed, insisted that it alone should dictate the terms upon which the Nicaragua route should be opened. The British claim was in defiance of the Monroe doctrine and without moral or legal basis.

Mr. Lawrence, United States minister at London, presented the protest of his Government. It was ignored. Sir Henry Bulwer, the British minister at Washington, realizing that Mr. Clayton, the Secretary of State in President Zachary Taylor's Cabinet, had been alarmed by other acts of British aggression involving the seizure of Tigre Island, ignored Mr. Lawrence, and concluded the Clayton-Bulwer treaty directly with Mr. Clayton. This treaty was ratified July 5, 1850. The treaty provided that neither Great Britain nor the United States should ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the canal or erect fortifications upon it, nor occupy or exercise any dominion over any part of Central America; and that in the event of war the vessels of Great Britain or the United States must be permitted to pass unmolested, and that both parties should guard the safety and preserve the neutrality of the canal. The treaty also provided that the parties to it had been actuated, not only by the desire to accomplish a particular object, "but also to establish a general principle," and that "they hereby agree to extend their protection, by treaty stipulation, to any other practicable communication, whether by canal or railway, across the Isthmus * * * and especially to interoceanic communications * * * which are now proposed to be established by way of Tehuantepec or Panama."

By this treaty Great Britain tied the hands of the United States and reserved to herself the absolute power of obstruction. It is unnecessary to comment upon the opposition which the American people manifested to this treaty, or to trace the many diplomatic controversies which arose in regard to it, or to note the forcible objections which Seward, Evarts, and Blaine felt compelled to make to it. The significant fact to be here noted is that, until the treaty was superseded in 1901, it presented a complete bar to the efforts of the United States to secure the building of the canal.

In 1878 the Wyse concession was made by Colombia, and subsequently a French construction company was organized under the presidency of Ferdinand de Lesseps to build the Panama Canal. The prospect of the canal under French control was cause for alarm in the United States. In a special message to Congress March 8, 1880, President Hayes asserted that the policy of the United States required a canal under American control. Mr. Blaine, in language so forcible as not to permit of misunderstanding, pointed out that the passage of the armed vessels of a hostile nation through the Panama Canal would be no more admissible than the passage of armed forces of a hostile nation over the railway lines joining the Atlantic and the Pacific shores of the United States. The French Government gave the United States its assurance that it did not aim at political control, and expressed "its firm purpose to allow the character of the enterprise inaugurated by M. de Lesseps to remain an essentially private one." (See the Treaty regulations of the United States and Colombia, by John H. Latané, Ph. D., Annals of the American Academy of Political Science, 1903.) The failure of the French company in 1888 permanently defeated the efforts of M. de Lesseps, and the hope that the canal would be built was again deferred.

On November 18, 1901, the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was concluded. It recites the desire of the United States and Great Britain to facilitate the construction of a ship canal "by whatever route may be considered expedient," and to remove the objections arising from the Clayton-Bulwer treaty without impairing the "general principle of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention."

The first article of the treaty provided that it should supersede the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. The second article provides "that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States," either at its own cost or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations or through subscription to or to purchase of stock and shares. This article also provides that the United States "shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal."

The third article of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty deals with the neutralization of the canal, and in its first subdivision provides that "the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges shall be just and equitable."

Article 4 of the treaty provides "that no change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the before-mentioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties to the present treaty." This clause was evidently inserted to guard against the treaty being impaired by changes in the South American Republics, but it did not contemplate the possibility of the United States acquiring the territory through which the canal is to be pierced. A study of the treaty in connection with the convention of Constantinople and with a full understanding of the circumstances under which the treaty was made shows clearly that the acquisition of the canal territory by the United States was not foreseen by either of the contracting parties. It should be noted that nothing contained in the treaty imposes any prohibition upon either of the contracting parties from purchasing territory to be traversed by the proposed canal.

On January 20, 1902, President Roosevelt sent to Congress a message recommending the construction of the canal at Panama. His message proposed the purchase of the French rights for $40,000,000. Congress acted upon this suggestion and appropriated $170,000,000, and directed the President, if the consent of Colombia could not be obtained, to have the canal constructed by the Nicaragua route at a cost not to exceed $180,000,000. The Hay-Herran treaty between the United States and Colombia was then negotiated, by which Colombia was to grant the desired privilege in return for $10,000,000 and an annual rental of $250,000. The terms of this proposed treaty had been agreed upon between the accredited representatives of the United States and Colombia, and the Senate of the United States on March 17, 1903, ratified the proposed treaty. The Colombian Government, however, sought to repudiate the promise of its representative, and indicated that it would ratify the treaty if it was paid $25,000,000. When the United States refused to yield to this demand Colombia concluded that it could not "constitutionally" comply with its promise to ratify the treaty. That the alleged constitutional objection was a mere pretense is evident from the fact that it could have been overcome by a payment of $15,000,000 more than the United States had agreed to pay and Colombia to accept. The action of Colombia in causing the proposed treaty to fail of ratification incensed and embittered the people of the State of Panama, whose interests would have been greatly promoted by the construction of the canal. The attitude of Colombia served to intensify the spirit of revolt among the people of Panama, who for many years had been treated unjustly by the Colombian Government. This last act of Colombia showed such a total disregard of the interests of the people of Panama and was instigated by motives so sordid and odious that the State of Panama seceded from Colombia and established a provisional government. Within a short time the United States, Great Britain, and France recognized the independence of the new Republic of Panama.

On November 18, 1903, M. Bunau Varilla, the accredited representative of Panama, and Secretary Hay signed the treaty of Panama, which was duly ratified. This treaty grants the United States in perpetuity a zone of land and land under water for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the canal of the width of 10 miles, beginning in the Caribbean Sea and extending to and across the Isthmus of Panama into the Pacific Ocean, with the exception of the cities of Panama and Colon. Certain other incidental territory and islands are also granted. The treaty grants the United States "all the rights, power, and authority" within the zone mentioned "which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the territory within which the said lands and waters are located, to the entire exclusion of the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power, and authority." Article 5 of this treaty grants to the United States in perpetuity a monopoly for the construction, maintenance, and operation of any system of communication, by means of canal or railway, across its territory between the Caribbean Sea and the Pacific Ocean. In return for this grant the United States guarantees to maintain the independence of the Republic of Panama and to pay Panama $10,000,000, and from nine years after the date of the treaty to make an annual payment of $250,000 during the life of the treaty. The eighteenth article of this treaty provides that "the canal, when constructed, and the entrances thereto, shall be neutral in perpetuity, and shall be opened upon the terms provided for by section 1 of article 3 of and in conformity with all the stipulations of the treaty entered into by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain on November 18, 1901." In considering this provision of the Panama treaty, it is to be borne in mind that it is binding only upon the parties to it. That treaty prescribes and defines the correlative rights and duties of the United States and of the Republic of Panama. It does not enlarge the rights of Great Britain in reference to the canal. Great Britain was not a party to the Hay-Varilla treaty, and any obligation that was imposed upon the United States under it is due solely to the Republic of Panama, and is subject to any change that may be effected by mutual consent of the contracting parties.

This historical outline makes clear the steps which the United States has taken and the difficulties which it has finally overcome. The territory through which the canal is being constructed is subject solely to the sovereignty of the United States. Now that the United States has done everything requisite and necessary to make the canal available for use and has pledged itself to preserve to the commerce of the world the right to use it upon fair and reasonable terms, Great Britain comes forward to enter its protest against the exemption of American coastwise trade, with which, under existing laws, foreign nations can not compete.

THE BRITISH PROTEST.

The Panama Canal act, providing for the government of the Canal Zone and exempting coastwise trade from tolls, was enacted after a careful and scientific inquiry by Congress into the conditions affecting the Panama Canal. On December 9, 1912, Ambassador Bryce filed with the Secretary of State of the United States a protest against certain provisions of the Panama Canal act. The protest was signed for the British Government by Sir Edward Grey. The protest is based on the contention that the provisions of the Panama Canal act contravene the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The particulars in which this act is claimed to be in conflict with the treaty are: (1) The provisions of section 5 of the act, which confer upon the President, within certain defined limits, the right to fix the tolls, but provide that no tolls are to be levied upon ships engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States. There is also an exemption made pursuant to article 19 of the Panama treaty, according to which the Republic of Panama has the right to transport over the canal its vessels and its troops and munitions of war without paying charges of any kind. If the United States should yield to this part of the British protest it would be necessary for it to act in violation of its treaty with the Republic of Panama. It is claimed that these provisions, first, are in conflict with the rule established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of equal treatment for British and United States ships; and, second, would enable tolls to be fixed which would not be just and equitable and would therefore not comply with rule 1 of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. (2) The provisions of section 11 of the act, which prohibit a railway company subject to the interstate-commerce act of 1887 from having any interest in vessels which operate through the canal, and that part of the same section which provides that a vessel permitted to engage in constwise or foreign trade of the United States shall not be permitted to use the canal if its owner is guilty of violating the Sherman Antitrust Act.

Both of these claims rest upon the assumption that the events which have occurred since the ratification of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty can have no effect upon the validity of that treaty. In reference to the claim based on section 11 of the act, the protest makes no argument, but calls attention to the fact that if the provisions of that section are to be deemed applicable to British ships, the British Government reserves the right to amplify its protest after further study of the question involved. The reasons which impelled Congress to enact section 1 of the act are obvious. By these provisions it was sought to prevent monopoly of transportation in the canal and thus to keep the canal open to the free competition of the commerce of the world. Experience has taught the lesson that when the same company controls the means of transportation by land and sea competition is rendered impossible.

President Taft, in an effort to place upon the Hay-Pauncefote treaty a construction which would make it adaptable to the changed conditions which have resulted since the acquisition of the Canal Zone by the United States, treated the words "all nations," used in subdivision 1 of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, as excluding the United States. The British protest refuses to accept this construction, and, referring to the argument of President Taft, announces plainly that "His Majesty's Government believe this statement of the case to be wholly at variance with the real question. They consider that by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty the United States has surrendered the right to construct the canal, and that by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty it recovered that right, upon the footing that the canal should be open to British and United States vessels upon equal terms." Great Britain, therefore, having explicitly refused to be bound by any construction of the treaty which recognizes and makes allowance for the changed conditions which have resulted since the adoption of the treaty, squarely presents to the United States the alternative of adopting an American canal policy or an Anglo-American canal policy. Under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty Great Britain claimed to be a partner in the canal enterprise with the United States. Under the British protest, transmitted by Sir Edward Grey, Great Britain still claims all the benefits of a partnership, although all the burdens of the enterprise are, under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, to be borne solely by the United States. The importance of the protest consists, not in the fact that it relates to tolls, but in the fact that it carries with it the assertion that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty exists with the same force and effect to-day that it possessed before the United States became the sovereign over the territory through which the canal is being constructed. If this claim be admitted and the words "all nations," as used in subdivision 1 of article 3 of the Hay-

Pauncefote treaty, are to be regarded as including the United States, then the following consequences result:

The United States must impose the same rate of tolls upon its merchant ships, war ships, or Government vessels that it does upon those of foreign nations; it can never blockade the canal or exercise any right of war in it, even if it is itself a belligerent, and the representatives of the United States at Panama must open the locks and escort a hostile fleet through the canal; if the United States becomes a belligerent it shall not revictual or take stores in the canal, except when strictly necessary; it shall not embark or disembark troops or munitions of war in the canal territory, and its own war vessels shall not remain in the waters adjacent to the canal within the 3-mile limit for longer than 24 hours at any one time; and it can not use the plant and surroundings of the canal for any hostile purpose.

In short, if the United States should become a belligerent it could not use its own canal for naval and military purposes, and the canal would be of no more strategic value to it than it would be to its enemy. (Judge Seabury is, of course, stating these conclusions as a reductio ad absurdum. The reply to this argument, made by those who advocate the maintenance of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, is that in time of war all treaties will be abrogated, but the whole trend of Judge Seabury's argument is that the treaty was abrogated when the United States acquired the canal territory.—The Editors.)

Indeed, in time of war, if the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty are to govern, our seacoast would be more liable to attack than it was before the canal was built. Before the canal was built the isolation of our seaboard furnished comparative protection from foreign attack. The existence of the canal will make our coast thousands of miles nearer to the shores of a foreign enemy. If the canal shall be available to us for naval and military purposes, this danger will be obviated. If it is not to be available for these purposes, then we have increased the danger of our position rather than increased our safety. One has only to read the provisions of the six subdivisions of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to see at a glance that if one of these subdivisions is binding upon us all are binding. The same obligation which would require us to levy equal tolls, as provided by subdivision 1, would compel us to refrain from blockading the canal or from utilizing the canal for any military or naval purpose in the manner prohibited by the other subdivisions of article 3. The British protest does not specifically claim that all of these provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty are applicable at present, but it attacks a comparatively unimportant regulation of Congress upon a ground which asserts the binding effect of that treaty. The British protest makes no renunciation of rights under the treaty. It does, however, recognize that, as a result of events subsequent to the treaty, the United States has "become the practical sovereign of the canal," and that all the provisions of the treaty are not to be deemed of the same force that they possessed when the treaty was concluded. The significance of this remarkable part of the British protest will be commented upon below. For the present it is necessary only to note that even the British Government recognizes that a change in the status existing at the time the treaty was made has taken place, and that it is impossible to claim that the legal effect of the treaty has not been changed.

THE STATE OF THINGS WHICH WAS THE BASIS OF THE HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY HAS CHANGED, AND THAT TREATY IS NOW VOIDABLE AT THE OPTION OF THE UNITED STATES.

It is a rule of international law, recognized among nations and publicists, that all treaties are concluded upon the tacit condition rebus sic stantibus. If vital changes affecting the subject matter of a treaty take place, so that it can not fairly be said that the parties contracted in reference to the changed conditions, the treaty is by implication abrogated. In other words, if the parties to a treaty contract on the basis that a certain condition or fact exists, and subsequently the condition or fact in reference to which the treaty is made is changed, the treaty is extinguished, and one of the parties to it can not in good faith hold the other bound to perform all or any of its terms. The fundamental fact in reference to which the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was made was that the canal was to be constructed in territory alien to the United States. The Hay-Pauncefote treaty did not even definitely decide upon the Panama route, but provided for the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans "by whatever route may be considered expedient."

The treaty contemplated merely that the canal should be constructed "under the auspices" of the United States, not in the territory of the United States. That the United States did not contemplate the actual acquisition of the territory in which the canal was to be constructed is conclusively evidenced by the fact that the Senate ratified the treaty with Colombia, which merely provided for constructing the canal "under the auspices" of the United States, and did not contemplate the cession of territory to the United States. The failure of Colombia to fulfill the promise of its accredited representative, the bitterness and spirit of revolt which that refusal engendered among the people of the State of Panama, led to the revolution which resulted in the secession of Panama from Colombia. The United States having been betrayed by Colombia, President Roosevelt, with characteristic genius, took the action which resulted in the United States securing the grant from Panama. Under that grant the Canal Zone became part of the territory of the United States and subject to its sovereignty, and the United States from that time on possessed the same exclusive rights over it that it possessed in reference to any other territory which it acquired by cession or conquest.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty was made on the understanding that the canal was to be constructed upon alien territory. For this reason the position of the United States relative to the canal was regarded as analogous to the position of Great Britain toward the Suez Canal. Assuming that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty provides for equal rights in the canal to Great Britain and the United States, although all the burdens of building and caring for it and policing it were to devolve upon the United States, the situation becomes radically different after the territory becomes subject to the sovereignty of the United States. Suppose, merely for the sake of argument, instead of acquiring the Canal Zone in Panama, the United States abandoned that project and constructed the canal from New Orleans to San Francisco, would it be contended that the canal was subject to the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty? In legal effect and in principle the supposed case and the real case are identical. The treaty was made on the assumption that the canal was to be built in alien territory. The condition in reference to which the treaty was made never arose; and instead of the canal's being built in alien territory, it was built in territory of the United States.

The juridical status of the Panama Canal is that of an artificially constructed waterway, constructed wholly by the United States for commercial and strategic purposes, entirely through territory of the United States, the exclusive right of control over which is vested in the United States. The legal position of the United States and Great Britain in reference to the canal stands, when the case is reduced to its simplest terms, thus: A and B contract that A shall endeavor to obtain an easement over the land of C, and if A succeeds, the easement shall be used equally by A and B, but without any prohibition in the contract against either A or B acquiring the fee to C's land. Subsequently C grants in fee the property to A and his heirs. The judgment of the private law of civilized states in such a case holds that the contract between A and B is no longer of any legal force or effect.

The principle asserted above—that all treaties are concluded upon the tacit condition rebus sic statibus, and that, where the state of things which was the basis of the treaty and one of its tacit conditions no longer exists, the treaty becomes voidable, and either party may notify the other that it regards the treaty as abrogated—is sustained by authority. The principle was clearly recognized by Vattel (Law of Nations, book 2, ch. 13, sec. 200) and by Grotius (The Rights of War and Peace, ch. 16, sec. 25, et seq.) and, so far as I have been able to discover, is denied by none. Mr. Hall, in his work on international law, points out that neither party to an international compact "can make its binding effect dependent at his will upon conditions other than those contemplated at the moment when the contract was entered into, and, on the other hand, a contract ceases to be binding so soon as anything which formed an implied condition of its obligatory force at the time of its conclusion is essentially altered." (Sec. 116.) Mr. Hannis Taylor says:

"So unstable are the conditions of international existence, and so difficult is it to enforce a contract between States after the state of facts upon which it was founded has substantially changed, that all such agreements are necessarily made subject to the general understanding that they shall cease to be obligatory so soon as the conditions upon which they were executed are essentially altered." (Treaties on International Public Law, sec. 394.)

Writing upon the same object, Mr. Oppenheim says:

"It is an almost universally recognized fact that vital changes of circumstances may be of such a kind as to justify a party in notifying an unnotifiable treaty. The vast majority of publicists, as well as all the Governments of the members of the family of nations, agree that all treaties are concluded under the tacit condition rebus sic stantibus." (Vol. 1, p. 550, sec. 539.)

That the circumstances have changed to such an extent that some of the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty are extinguished is impliedly conceded by Sir Edward Grey in the British protest. He says:

"Now that the United States has become the practical sovereign of the canal His Majesty's Government do not question its title to exercise belligerent rights for its protection."

His statement suggests that if it had been contemplated that the United States was to acquire the territory through which the canal should be constructed clauses would have been inserted in the treaty which would have established the status of the United States as similar to that accorded Turkey and Egypt in reference to the Suez Canal. It is, of course, not improbable, if the possibility of the acquisition by the United States had been foreseen, that Great Britain would have made even this suggestion; but it ought not to be assumed that the United States would have consented to occupy toward its own canal an attitude similar to that which European powers, under the direction of Great Britain, have accorded Turkey and Egypt toward the Suez Canal.

The statement made in the British protest indicates that the next contention of Great Britain will be that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty has been constructively modified so as to make articles 10 and 13 of the Suez Canal convention applicable to the United States. However this may be, it is needless to speculate. The important circumstance now to be noted is that although Great Britain does not ask for a formal modification of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, nor renounce any legal rights she may have under the treaty, the concession is distinctly made that the changed conditions have modified some of the provisions of the treaty. Although this concession does not define which of the stipulations of the treaty the British Government considers to have been extinguished, it apparently concedes certain belligerent rights to the United States which, if the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty were in force, the United States would not possess. There is no justification for the claim that the abrogation of the provisions of the treaty has been pro tanto. If the state of things which was the vital condition of the treaty no longer exists, the whole treaty justly may be abrogated. One thing is plain as to the legal effect of the treaty: Either all of its stipulations are binding upon the United States or none of them are binding. From a juridical standpoint the change which has taken place is the most fundamental that could occur. The very subject matter of the treaty, which the treaty contemplated should continue to be territory alien to the United States, has become absolutely subject to the sovereignty of the United States. To hold, under these circumstances, that all the terms of the treaty are binding upon the United States would be preposterous and does not seem to be claimed in the British protest. The same circumstances which relieve the United States of some of the terms of the treaty relieve it of all of them. It can hardly be asserted, if changes so vital occur that some of the terms of a treaty are extinguished, one of the parties to the treaty can determine which of the other provisions of the treaty shall continue to be binding upon the other party to the compact. As some of the terms of this treaty are concededly no longer binding, none of them is binding if the United States shall so elect. The Hay-Pauncefote treaty has now become voidable, and the United States is entirely justified under accepted principles of international law in notifying Great Britain that it no longer considers that treaty to be in force. If the United States is to adopt an American canal policy, this it must do. If it does not do this, it must admit the claim of Great Britain to be an equal partner with the United States in the canal enterprise. The latter course involves the establishment of an Anglo-American canal policy in direct defiance of the Monroe doctrine, and it will create an entangling alliance which in the future must inevitably be the source of dissension and strife.

CONCLUSION.

The question has arisen whether the controversy as to the Panama Canal should be submitted to the Tribunal of The Hague for arbitration. Sir Edward Grey, in the British protest, suggests that if the provisions of the Panama Canal act, to which objection is made, are not repealed the question at issue should be submitted to arbitration. This suggestion involves the consideration of two questions:

First, does the arbitration treaty require the submission of the question at issue to arbitration? And, second, if it does not so require, should the United States consent to the submission of this question to arbitration?

If existing treaties require the submission of the question to arbitration, the matter is settled, and nothing remains to the United States but to adopt this course. The convention of 1899 for the arbitration of international disputes was signed by the representatives of the United States subject to a reservation which is set forth at length after their signatures. That reservation is as follows:

"Nothing contained in this convention shall be so construed as to require the United States of America to depart from its traditional policy of not entering upon, interfering with, or entangling itself in the political questions of policy or internal administration of any foreign State; nor shall anything contained in the said convention be construed to imply a relinquishment by the United States of America of its traditional attitude toward purely American questions."

Inasmuch as the Panama Canal is constructed in territory exclusively subject to the sovereignty of the United States, any question as to its control is a purely American question, as to which the United States, in signing the treaty referred to, refused to relinquish its traditional attitude. The traditional attitude of the United States is inconsistent with the submission to arbitration of any question as to a part of the territory over which its exclusive sovereignty extends. That the Monroe doctrine represents the traditional attitude of the United States will not be questioned, nor will it be seriously urged that the United States should submit to arbitration the question as to whether it should adhere to or renounce the Monroe doctrine as a part of its national policy. That doctrine involves one of the very questions which the representatives of the United States reserved the right to withhold from arbitration. It has never been a doctrine which commended itself to European statesmen, but it defines a policy essential to the development and national existence of the United States. The controversy as to the control of the Panama Canal is of precisely the same character, and the reservation made by the representatives of the United States in signing the arbitration treaty relieves the United States from submitting this question to arbitration. As to whether it would be good policy to submit this particular question to arbitration may be safely left to the good judgment of the American Congress. Congress, realizing the unfortunate experiences which the United States has had in dealing with the Panama Canal, may well hesitate to jeopardize the present position which the United States has attained by submitting so purely an American question to the arbitrament of a foreign tribunal.

The treaty of April 4, 1908, between the United States and Great Britain provides that "differences which may arise of a legal nature or relating to the interpretation of treaties existing between the two contracting parties, and which it may not have been possible to settle by diplomacy, shall be referred to the permanent court of arbitration established at The Hague by the convention of the 29th of July, 1899, provided, nevertheless, that they do not affect the vital interests, the independence, or the honor of the two contracting States, and do not concern the interests of third parties."

This treaty imposes upon the United States no obligation to arbitrate the present controversy, because that controversy does not relate "to the interpretation of treaties existing between the two contracting parties."

It has already been pointed out that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is now voidable and may be rendered void by the United States giving notice to Great Britain of the election so to declare the treaty. Moreover, it is plain that the present controversy falls squarely within the exception contained in the clause of the treaty quoted above. The question at issue does affect the vital interests, the independence, and the honor of the United States. It is a question which does concern the Republic of Panama, and therefore is not referable as a matter of right under this treaty. The exemption of vessels of the Republic of Panama from tolls under the provisions of the Panama Canal act was provided for in compliance with article 19 of the Panama treaty. The British protest is against this provision of the act. If this question is submitted to arbitration and should be determined adversely to us, the United States would be obliged either to comply with the award of the arbitration tribunal and violate its treaty with Panama or to violate the arbitration award and comply with its treaty with Panama. The question at issue does, therefore, "concern the interests of third parties," and is one in reference to which the treaty provides that it need not be submitted to arbitration.

The adoption of an American canal policy is in accord with the best traditions of the United States. It is the only policy which can be pursued consistent with the maintenance of the Monroe doctrine. The utterances of American statesmen which are sometimes quoted as favoring a contrary policy were utterances made on the assumption that the canal was to be built on territory alien to the United States. The position assumed by President Cleveland was based on the desire to avoid "entangling alliances" with the country through which it was supposed the canal would be constructed. The traditional attitude of the American people in reference to the canal was expressed by Gen. Grant when he said, "I commend an American canal, on American soil, to the American people." After a century crowded with difficulties and vicissitudes the Panama Canal, as the result of American genius, is about to be opened to the world. It is constructed wholly on territory subject to the sovereignty of the United States, and that country is shortly to determine whether it will pursue in regard to it an American policy or whether, disregarding the lessons of experience and in violation of American traditions, it will admit Great Britain as an equal partner in the enterprise. If an Anglo-American policy is desired, the United States will comply with the demands contained in the British protest. If an American canal policy is to be adopted, the Government at Washington will deal in no uncertain way with the British protest. The present is no time for vacillation or hesitancy. The requirements of the situation demand that the Government at Washington shall plainly inform the British Government that the conditions under which the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was concluded have vitally changed, and that that treaty is now, under the principles of international law, voidable, and give notice that the United States regards it as without force or effect.

Such action is required by every consideration of justice, and should be taken without equivocation. Any other course will involve gross injustice to the United States and will serve only to postpone the time when the United States, in self-defense, will be compelled to take the position suggested. As the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is now voidable rather than void, the Government of the United States should see to it that no action or failure to act on its part shall be construed into a renunciation of the rights which at present, under well-settled principles, it possesses.

Just and courageous action on the part of the United States will remove all difficulties which are presented by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and leave the pathway free for the adoption of an American canal policy. An American canal, constructed by American enterprise on American soil, subject to the absolute and exclusive control of the United States, will prove a safeguard in times of war, and in times of peace will confer the greatest benefits not only upon the United States but upon all mankind.

THE CONSERVATION OF WATER POWERS (S. DOC. NO. 14).

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask to have printed as a public document a paper which I hold in my hand, the title of which is "The conservation of water powers." It is a very interesting and instructive paper.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama requests that the paper which he presents be printed as a public document.

Mr. SMOOT. Let me ask the Senator from Alabama by whom the article is written.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is written by Rome G. Brown, of Minneapolis, Minn., and taken from the Harvard Law Review. It is entitled "The conservation of water powers," a question that is being discussed all over the country. It is a legal discussion of the matter, and I hope there will be no objection to my request.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama a question. I understand the paper is a brief by Mr. R. G. Brown on the subject of water power. Has not this already been printed as a public document?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Oh, no. This article has just appeared in the current number of the Harvard Law Review.

Mr. BURTON. The original brief has been published, then.

Mr. BANKHEAD. This is an entirely different matter. It is just published.

Mr. BURTON. How long is it?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is not long; only a few pages. It will make a short document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered.

AMENDMENTS TO SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BANKHEAD submitted an amendment proposing to pay the balance due the depositors in the Freedman's Savings & Trust Co., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BRISTOW submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $800 for the construction of a bridge across Chilocco Creek where it intercepts the State line of Kansas and the Chilocco School Reservation in Oklahoma, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was ordered to be printed and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MYERS submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for administration and improvement of the Glacier National Park, Mont., from $100,000 to $188,000, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. JONES (for Mr. CLAPP) submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 10) to reduce tariff duties, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, which were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

VALORIZATION OF COFFEE, ETC.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I submit the following Senate resolution, which I ask may be read, and then I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 58), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney General be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate the following information:

1. Copies of any and all requests asking for the dismissal of the case of the United States of America, petitioner, v. Herman Sielcken et al., defendants, heretofore pending in the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

2. Copies of any and all agreements that were made by the parties to said action during its pendency providing for its discontinuance or its dismissal.

3. Copies of any and all correspondence regarding the maintenance or dismissal of said action.

4. Copies of any and all reports that were made by any agent or special attorney of the Government investigating the existence of any trust or combination in coffee or any scheme or plan for the valorization of coffee.

5. The name and address of the parties purchasing the coffee involved in said suit, together with the price and the amount purchased by each.

6. Copies of any memoranda, correspondence, letters, or documents on file in the Department of Justice pertaining to or connected with the settlement and dismissal of said action.

7. Any additional statement that he may desire to make touching any of the above matters.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have another resolution on the same subject which ought to be considered, perhaps, in connection with this one. I ask that the resolution may be read and that unanimous consent may be given for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 59), as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate the following information:

1. Copies of all letters and communications from the ambassadors, representatives, or agents of any foreign Government requesting the dismissal of the case of the United States of America, petitioner, v. Herman Sielcken et al., defendants, heretofore pending in the district Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

2. A statement of the reasons given for the dismissal of said case by any such ambassadors, representatives, or agents not made in writing.

3. Copies of any and all communications made by such ambassadors, agents, or representatives relating to or connected with the sale of the coffee involved in said case.

4. Copies of all evidence submitted to the Department of State tending to show or offered for the purpose of showing that the sale of said coffee was bona fide.

5. The names of said purchasers, the date of the making of the various sales, and the amount of coffee involved in each sale.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I should like to ask if that resolution is addressed to the Secretary of State?

Mr. NORRIS. It is, Mr. President.

Mr. LODGE. Inquiries relating to our foreign relations are always, I think I may say, addressed to the President of the United States, and accompanied with words requesting him to transmit the papers, if not incompatible with the public interests. I think it is wiser, in a matter relating to foreign relations, that that form be followed.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to say to the Senator from Massachusetts that I understand the rule as to putting into a request the words "if not incompatible with the public interest"; it applies only to resolutions asking for information from the President.

Mr. LODGE. I have never known the Secretary of State to be asked for any information about our foreign relations. Such requests are always addressed to the President of the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. I would have no objection, even though it be directed to the Secretary of State, to inserting the words "if not incompatible with the public interest." Of course I would not want by this resolution to do anything that is contrary to the practice and precedents of the past in calling upon the Department of State.

Mr. LODGE. I have no objection in the world to the resolution. The result will be the same in either case. The President of course has it wholly in his power to send any such documents as he sees fit, but it is the customary form in asking for papers relating to foreign relations to address the President and never the Secretary of State, because the President of course is charged by the Constitution with the conduct of our relations with foreign Governments. I merely suggested the usual form. I do not think the Secretary of State is ever asked for documents of that kind.

Mr. NORRIS. I am perfectly willing that the resolution shall be modified by addressing it to the President and inserting the words suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. CULBERSON. Let the resolution be read as modified.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution as modified.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested, if not incompatible with the public interest——

Mr. CULBERSON. That is sufficient.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. CULBERSON submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 60), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized, during the Sixty-third Congress, to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to employ a stenographer to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject that may be pending before said committee, and to have such hearings printed for the use of the committee; that the expenses of such hearings be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate; and that the said committee and all subcommittees thereof may sit during the sessions of the Senate.

ELLEN D. GIVENS.

Mr. ROBINSON submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 61), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the Senate, to Ellen D. Givens, widow of Edgar L. Givens, late a clerk in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, a sum equal to 12 months' salary at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

CLAIMS AGAINST MEXICO.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 62), which was read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Resolved, That the President is respectfully requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to cause to be transmitted to the Senate—

First. A full list of the names of claimants, if any, and the nature and amount of the claims for damages to person or property made by citizens of the United States of America against the Republic of Mexico and filed or deposited with the Department of State at Washington, D. C., since the beginning of the Madero revolution in Mexico to the present time, together with the statement of fact on which said claims are based.

Second. A full list of the names of all citizens of these United States, if any, who while leading lawful and peaceful lives in Mexico have been killed or wounded in Mexico or driven out of Mexico by Mexican soldiers or other armed bands on Mexican soil, together with the facts and circumstances attending such killing, wounding, or forceful deportation.

Third. A full list, if any, of such peaceful citizens of the United States of America as have been forcibly seized and held prisoners for ransom in the Republic of Mexico during the time first mentioned, and what sums of money, if any, have been paid by any person or persons to secure the release of anyone so imprisoned or held.

Fourth. What redress, if any, has been offered by Mexico in the premises, or demanded by the United States of America, and the result of such offer or demand, and what assurance of protection to the lives and property of our peaceful, law-abiding citizens in Mexico does that Republic offer.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. ASHURST. I submit a notice respecting the amendment of the rules of the body. I ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arizona gives notice of an amendment of the rules, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

In accordance with Rule XL, I hereby give notice that at an early date, to wit, at the next meeting of the Senate, I shall offer a resolution proposing an amendment of the rules of the Senate, by adding the following, to be known as Rule —:

"Resolved, That no committee of the Senate shall sit behind closed doors: Provided, however, That this rule shall not apply to any committee considering treaties, executive business, or matters affecting foreign relations."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The notice will lie over.

COTTON-GOODS INDUSTRY (S. DOC. NO. 13).

Mr. SMOOT. I ask to have printed as a Senate document an article taken from the New York Commercial of Thursday, April 10, 1913, relative to the cotton-goods industry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL THURSDAY.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Thursday next.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. NEWLANDS subsequently said: Numerous suggestions have been made to me that we should meet next Thursday at 2 o'clock instead of 12. I therefore ask unanimous consent to amend the motion just adopted so that the Senate shall meet at 2 o'clock on Thursday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? If there is no objection, the amendment moved by the Senator from Nevada that the Senate shall meet at 2 o'clock on Thursday next will be agreed to. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT OF ANTITRUST ACT.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, at the last session of the Senate I gave notice that to-day, after the close of the morning business, I would address the Senate upon the bill (S. 112) to restore section 1 of the act of Congress of July 2, 1890, chapter 647, Twenty-sixth Statutes at Large, to its original form as enacted, by striking out the words "unreasonable or undue," inserted therein by a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. I desire to give notice now that I shall address the Senate on that bill at the close of the morning business at its session next Thursday.

SUPPRESSION OF OPIUM TRAFFIC (H. DOC. NO 33).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In transmitting the accompanying report from the Secretary of State, I most strongly urge not only the immediate appropriation of the sum of $20,000 which is asked, the absolute necessity for which is so apparent, but also the enactment of the requisite antidrug legislation to which this Government is pledged internationally.

It is a source of gratification to me personally, and it will always be, I am confident, a subject of gratification to the Nation, that this Government, realizing the extent of the opium and allied evils, should have initiated the world-wide movement toward their abolition. At this vital period of the movement to fail to take the few final steps necessary definitively and successfully to conclude the work would be unthinkable, and I therefore trust that there may be no delay in the enactment of the desired legislation and the consequent mitigation, if not suppression, of the vice which has caused such world-wide misery and degradation.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 21, 1913.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The message and accompanying paper will be printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. STONE. Referred to the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. BACON. It should be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, I should say, Mr. President. Ought it not to be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It may go there if the Senator so desires, but it asks for an appropriation of $20,000.

Mr. BACON. I withdraw the suggestion, Mr. President. I did not hear the reading of the message distinctly.

Mr. BACON subsequently said: Mr. President, I desire to say, in regard to the message from the President which was recently read and referred, that upon examination I find it contains two recommendations: One is for an appropriation, which properly goes to the Appropriations Committee, and the other is for legislation which would fall within the province of the Committee on Foreign Relations. I therefore ask that the order of reference be modified to the extent that so much of the message as relates to legislation be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

PROPOSED LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask to take from the calendar Senate resolution No. 4, reported by the Committee on Rules with a report asking that the subject be referred to certain committees, and I ask that the report be adopted. I think the report of the Committee on Rules had better be read. It shows exactly what is proposed to be done with the resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. That is a report which went to the calendar under Rule VIII.

Mr. OVERMAN. The resolution went to the Committee on Rules, and the Committee on Rules submitted a report asking that the subject be referred to different committees.

Mr. GALLINGER. The report is now on the calendar.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is now on the calendar.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator asks unanimous consent to take up the report.

Mr. OVERMAN. I call up the report.

Mr. SMOOT. It can be called up by unanimous consent. I do not object.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think the report is perfectly satisfactory to the Senator from Nevada. The resolution is upon the calendar, and notice has been given that speeches are to be made upon it. I ask unanimous consent that the report be now taken up and that the various sections referred to be referred to the respective committees as reported by the Committee on Rules.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator means to refer the subjects to the various committees?

Mr. OVERMAN. To refer the subjects to the committee as reported in the resolution from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator would want to pass the resolution now on the calendar. There ought to be action on the resolution by the Senate.

Mr. OVERMAN. The action desired is to refer the various sections of the resolution as reported by the Committee on Rules.

Mr. GALLINGER. Precisely; but the Senate ought to so order by vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is no objection, the Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary proceeded to read the resolution.

Mr. OVERMAN. I did not ask for the reading of the resolution. The resolution is not now before the Senate. I asked for the reading of the report of the committee and for the adoption of the report of the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the report of the committee.

The Secretary read the report (No. 5), as follows:

The Committee on Rules, to whom was referred Senate resolution 4, having considered the same, report the resolution back to the Senate with the recommendation that each subhead contained therein be referred for consideration to the proper committee having jurisdiction of the subject matter, to wit:

That section 2, relating to tariff and taxation, be referred to the Committee on Finance.

That section 3, relating to interstate-commerce matters, be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

That section 4, relating to interstate exchange, be referred for consideration to the newly created Committee on Banking and Currency.

That section 5, relating to public lands and natural resources, be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

That section 6, relating to military expense and auxiliary Navy, be referred for consideration to the Committees on Military and Naval Affairs, respectively.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, there ought to be an amendment to that report. There is one part of the second heading of the resolution that ought not to go to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. It is a matter that pertains to the business of the Committee on Commerce and relates to the improvement of our navigable streams. I wish the Secretary would be kind enough to read that part of it which is on page 5 of the resolution. I have not a copy of it. That part of the resolution ought to go to the Committee on Commerce.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

(d) Whether it is advisable to provide for the creation of a board of river regulation which shall bring into cooperation the departments and services of the National Government whose duties in any way relate to waterways in devising and carrying out comprehensive plans for the promotion of interstate commerce by the regulation of river flow, the mitigation of destructive floods, by the promotion of storage above and of bank and levee protection below, the establishment of terminal and transfer facilities, the coordination of rail and water carriers, and the cooperation of the Nation with the States, each within its jurisdiction, in plans and works for the full and, so far as practicable, compensatory development of the rivers for every useful purpose, and the establishment of an ample fund for continuous work during a period of 10 years.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, if the chairman of the Committee on Rules has no objection, I shall move to amend the report so as to provide that the paragraph just read be referred to the Committee on Commerce instead of to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. OVERMAN. So far as I am concerned, I will accept the amendment. I think that was the intention of the Committee on Rules, though no action was taken upon the Senator's suggestion by the committee. Therefore I left it as the committee directed, but I think it is proper that that part of the resolution should go to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, before the Senate comes to any conclusion regarding that question I should like to be heard.

Regarding the suggestion of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], that subdivision (d) of resolution 3 be referred to the Committee on Commerce, instead of, as the resolution provides, to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, I have to say that it is true that in the past legislation relating to rivers and harbors has been referred to the Committee on Commerce, but I believe that the Committee on Interstate Commerce is the committee which should have jurisdiction relating to our rivers. I do not know whether the point has ever been made, but if it has not been made, it seems to me that this is a good time to make it.

The Committee on Interstate Commerce is of recent origin as compared with the Committee on Commerce. The Committee on Commerce at one time had jurisdiction of all the subjects now covered by the jurisdiction of both committees, but the Senate, in its wisdom, saw fit to divide the matters under the jurisdiction of the Committee on Commerce into two branches and to organize a Committee on Interstate Commerce for the express purpose of taking up all questions relating to interstate commerce.

Mr. President, the whole power of the National Government relating to rivers rests upon the power of the Nation regarding the regulation of interstate commerce. So far as the harbors are concerned, they belong to foreign commerce; but so far as the rivers are concerned, they are part of our interstate-commerce system. Our power to regulate and control them rests, not upon any special grant with reference to rivers, but upon a grant of power to the National Government to regulate commerce between the States; and it is the sole power under which the National Government can claim to exercise any jurisdiction over rivers, except such power as it has by reason of its ownership of the public domain regarding rivers within the borders of that domain; and there its powers are as proprietor of the land, and not as sovereign.

It seems to me that this is the right time to determine this question as to what committee has jurisdiction over this subject. Let me say in support of my view that this resolution not only covers the declaration of a policy regarding the rivers themselves, but it also declares for a policy for the establishment of terminal and transfer facilities on the rivers and the coordination of rail and water carriers.

So far as these subjects are concerned, they are now within the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Committee, and have always been considered so. The question of terminals and transfer facilities is a question that relates to the efficient exercise of power over interstate commerce, and the power to require coordination between the rail carriers and the water carriers is also a power which clearly belongs to the Interstate Commerce Committee.

The utmost that can be said is that this particular resolution involves a question that includes the jurisdiction of both committees. If that should be the sentiment of the Senate, the wise thing then would be to refer this particular section to both committees for their views and their reports, for, assuming that the Commerce Committee has thus far rightfully exercised the power actually to improve the rivers, certainly the Interstate Commerce Committee possesses the power to see to it that terminal facilities and transfer facilities are established, because they relate to interstate transportation; and they have the power to see to it that rail and water carriers coordinate so that public servants will, through a system of cooperation, effectually serve the public. My contention, therefore, is——

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to make a suggestion with regard to the question now before the Senate, which is rather an important one. The conflict between the jurisdiction of the Committee on Interstate Commerce and the Committee on Commerce ought not to be settled at this time; it ought not to be settled until the Committee on Rules has considered it. I suggest, therefore, to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] whether it would not be well to recommit the resolution to the Committee on Rules in order that the committee might consider the propriety of referring a part of it to the Committee on Commerce as well as a part to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. We will not be able to settle satisfactorily this morning the conflict of jurisdiction. There will be a number of Senators, I fancy, who will want to be heard upon that proposition.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then, let me make an additional suggestion to the Senator, and that is, that the action advised by the committee be taken with reference to all other subjects than the one covered by subdivision (d) of section 3, and that that be recommitted to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. CUMMINS. I make this suggestion because the Committee on Rules did not have under consideration the particular matter that has been presented by the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota; it was not called to our attention; and it seems to me that we ought to have an opportunity to look it over in the committee before it is made the subject of extended debate on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. NEWLANDS. But will not the Senator yield to my suggestion that that provision alone be recommitted to the Committee on Rules?

Mr. CUMMINS. I mean that; that is the only matter in dispute.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, if the Senator from Nevada will bear with me, there is another matter to which I wish to call attention that I think also should be recommitted, and that is subdivision (b) of section 5 of the resolution. I do this with some hesitation, because the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands is not present in the Hall and the chairman of the Committee on Conservation of National Resources is not present. It refers to recommendations regarding the protection of our natural resources in timber, coal, iron, and oil against monopolistic control.

It seems to me that if the Committee on Conservation of National Resources, which was formed but three or four years ago, has any jurisdiction whatever, it would be upon the very matter contained in this subdivision. Therefore I should like the Committee on Rules, before making their final report, if they are to recast their report, to take into consideration that suggestion.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I may say that I have no objection at all to the reference of that subdivision also to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Very well.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, would not subdivision (c) be included in the same head as subdivision (b) of that section—the applicability of the land laws of Canada, and so forth?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I would not be so sure of that, because that subdivision refers entirely to obtaining title to the land.

Mr. BURTON. I read from subdivision (c):

> And particularly those provisions regarding the grant of the surface to settlers, excluding from the operation of the grant timber, coal, iron, oil, and water-power sites.

Would not that be part of the proposed program of conservation?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. If the query is asked of me as to the legislative proposition, I should say that that should more properly go to the Committee on Public Lands, because it refers to the surface and the conditions under which the surface shall be granted. However, I think it perhaps ought all to go there.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that that subject matter has been before the Public Lands Committee for a number of years. I think subdivision (c) certainly ought to be referred to the Public Lands Committee:

> The applicability of the land laws of Canada to the conditions of our public domain, and particularly those provisions regarding the grant of the surface to settlers, excluding from the operation of the grant timber, coal, iron, oil, and water-power sites.

The Senator was a member of the Public Lands Committee, and he knows that that subject has been before it for years. I think rightfully it should be referred to that committee.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I think so, too, and my remarks applied only to subdivision (b). The Senator from Wyoming, as I understand, suggested that that subdivision be referred back to the Committee on Rules to determine whether it should go to the Committee on Public Lands or the Committee on Conservation of Natural Resources.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That was the suggestion.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And I assented to that.

Mr. SMOOT. And the Senator from Ohio suggested that subdivision (c) should also go to that committee. But I take it for granted that after further consideration, not only by the Senator from Ohio but by the Senator from Nevada, they will agree that subdivision (c) should go to the Public Lands Committee.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I think the Senator from Ohio will assent to that view.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I have no personal opinion on the subject. I notice that the Committee on Conservation of National Resources does not seem to be represented here. My suggestion was made only with the thought that there was enough of a question relating to subdivision (c) to justify referring back that paragraph or subdivision to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator insists upon that, of course I shall have no objection.

Mr. BURTON. I think it ought to go back to the committee.

Mr. NEWLANDS. But it seems to me that is a subject over which the Public Lands Committee has exercised jurisdiction for so long a period that there can be no question about it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, let both subjects go back to the committee.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I hope the whole report will be recommitted. I think we can reframe the report according to the ideas suggested here.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I think it necessary only as to the three subdivisions of the bill that have been referred to.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to suggest to the Senator, though, that the report would be much more complete for future reference if but one report were made. I believe, myself, as the Senator from North Carolina says, that it would be very much better to have the whole of the report go back and have a complete report than to have it made in two parts.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Of course I will yield to the view of the chairman of the committee, who wishes the entire report to go back.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think that is better, because it will be more complete, as the Senator from Utah suggests, if we make the report in accordance with the ideas suggested on the floor as to the different subjects. The committee took it up and reported back on each subject as it appeared in the resolution; but it seems that under each subject in the resolution there were subheads involving matters which ought to go to other committees.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Let me state that there are only three subheads that are now matters of contention. Why not except them and let the rest of the report be adopted?

Mr. OVERMAN. I think it would be better to let it go back and have a full report as to the whole matter.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, if no one else wishes to do it, I move that the whole resolution be recommitted to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will confine that action simply to the three subdivisions. It is important that these matters shall be considered by the various committees at as early a date as possible, and there is no contention about most of them.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have assumed, Mr. President, that no time would be lost by doing it. The Senator from Nevada knows that with his main purpose I am perfectly in sympathy; but we are in a tangle here now, and we shall never get anywhere unless we disentangle it.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Will the Senator from Iowa permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. CUMMINS. I move that the resolution be recommitted to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I want to say that there is nothing else to do. There is no such thing as amending a committee report by action on the floor. The committee report is an entirety. It must be dealt with by the Senate as an entirety. If defects are discovered in it, the report should be rejected, and it is a matter to be resubmitted to the committee. There has been an obvious defect discovered in this one, if indeed another term should not be applied to it. I am satisfied that it is not the report of the committee. I am satisfied that the committee would have made no such report if it had known what it was doing about this topic.

I make the point of order that there is nothing else to do with the report but either to adopt it, or to recommit it to the committee, or to reject it, and I suggest that the question is upon the motion offered by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, one of the leading members of the committee was upon the Committee on Rules, and the report is exactly in the terms of the motion made by a Senator who is a member of the Committee on Rules. I think it ought to go back, however.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order made by the Senator from Arkansas is sustained.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I have no objection to its going back to the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] that the resolution be recommitted to the Committee on Rules.

The motion was agreed to.

ASSISTANT CLERKS OR MESSENGERS TO SENATORS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I call up for consideration Senate resolution 15, being Order of Business No. 4, under Rule VIII.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi asks unanimous consent for the consideration of a resolution, the title of which will be stated by the Secretary.

Mr. SMOOT. Do I understand that the Senator has asked unanimous consent?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have a right to move it, if necessary. I ask unanimous consent for the present. If I do not get it, I will move it.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 15: A resolution to authorize the employment of an assistant clerk to certain committees.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I am not going to object to the consideration of this resolution, because I think it ought to pass; but I stated the other day that I should like to offer an amendment. I will say that if the chairman of the committee will give me assurance, not as to the character of action the committee is likely to take, but that in the near future the committee will act upon the matter that I submitted and bring it before the Senate, so that we will have an opportunity to act on it, I will not delay this resolution at all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, there was a resolution introduced, to which the Senator from Washington is referring, which provides that every Member of the Senate shall be permitted to have three employees. That matter was brought to the attention of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. Several Senators were heard upon it. The committee has the matter under consideration, but passed a resolution to postpone it until the next meeting, and to take it up then for definite action. The next meeting will be held on Saturday. The committee will act upon it, one way or the other, at that time.

Mr. JONES. And bring it before the Senate? Very well; then I will not interpose any objection to this resolution, because it ought to pass.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The committee will act upon it, one way or the other, at that time; but it may, of course, in its judgment, adopt it or report it adversely or indefinitely postpone it. I do not know what the committee will do, but it will act upon the resolution at that time.

Mr. JONES. What I want to get at is whether the committee will bring its report before the Senate, so that the Senate will have an opportunity to pass upon it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course I do not know about that, but I suppose it will either act adversely or act favorably, and in either event the matter will be brought to the Senate; or the committee may indefinitely postpone it. I think not, however.

Mr. JONES. Of course I do not think the committee should indefinitely postpone it. I think the committee ought to act one way or the other. I do not ask the Senator to assure me as to what action it will take. All I wish is to have the committee bring in its report, whether adverse or favorable.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course I can not give an assurance beforehand as to what the committee will do. I can only give the Senator my judgment. I think it will report it favorably or adversely, one or the other. That is my opinion.

Mr. JONES. Then I shall not object to the present consideration of this resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none, and the resolution is before the Senate.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution (S. Res. 15) to authorize the employment of an assistant clerk to certain committees.

The resolution had been reported from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, with an amendment, to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert a substitute, so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the Committees on Coast and Insular Survey, on Enrolled Bills, on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture, on Expenditures in the Departments of Commerce and Labor, on Standards, Weights, and Measures, on Expenditures in the Department of State, on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game, on National Banks, on Public Health and National Quarantine, on Geological Survey, to Investigate Trespassers upon Indian Lands, on the Mississippi River and its Tributaries, on Pacific Railroads, on Railroads, on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard, on the University of the United States, on Woman Suffrage, to Examine the Several Branches of the Civil Service, on Indian Depredations, on Transportation and Sale of Meat Products, on Engrossed Bills, on the Five Civilized Tribes of Indians, on Additional Accommodations for the Library of Congress, on Private Land Claims, on Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments, on Revolutionary Claims, on Corporations Organized in the District of Columbia, on conference of the minority of the Senate be, and they are hereby, authorized to employ one assistant clerk each, at $1,200 per annum, to be paid from "Miscellaneous items" of the contingent fund of the Senate until otherwise provided for by law: Provided, That if any of the committees recited above already have three employees the resolution shall not apply to them, except that this proviso shall not apply to the conference of the minority of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is upon the amendment offered by the committee.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Let the resolution be read.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will say, in explanation of it, that it takes in all of the committees of the Senate, the majority and minority, which have not already three employees, giving to each one of them that now has only two an additional man at $1,200 per annum.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, let me ask the chairman of the committee why it was deemed necessary to propose such a resolution at this time?

Mr. WILLIAMS. In the first place, I do not know whether I am speaking out of order or not, but the Democratic caucus instructed me to make that request.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Democratic caucus instructed the Senator to make the request? That is pretty good authority, to be sure; but my understanding of the organization of the Senate is this:

There are 11 so-called minority committees which have three clerks. Probably not all of them are designated as clerks, but they have three clerks. There were 10 committees assigned to the Democratic minority two years ago that were limited to two clerks by the agreement under which the committees were assigned to this side of the Chamber.

The only distinction in regard to the privileges accorded to the chairman of such a committee is that his clerk has a salary of probably $400 more, and his stenographer probably $200 or $240 more, than the employees of the individual Senator who is not chairman of a committee.

The Democrats who held those chairmanships were quite anxious to have the third clerk added; whether from necessity, or whether for the sake of uniformity, I do not at this time recall. I served upon the committee of which the distinguished Senator from Mississippi is now chairman, and we considered the matter, and felt bound to observe the terms of the agreement. Besides that, we were unable to find that there was any reason for giving to those nominal committees an additional clerkship that did not also include every other Senator upon this floor. Those committees had no real existence. They had no work to do. It was merely an indirect means by which the plan was adopted of concealing the fact that those particular Senators had privileges that other Senators did not enjoy.

We felt, first, that under the agreement we were precluded from making a demand for the third clerk for these 10 committees; next, that the public service did not require the increased number of clerks; and we steadily and resolutely refused to permit our associates on this side of the Chamber to enjoy the privilege of having a third clerk for those particular 10 committees.

Now, it is proposed to extend the number of useless clerkships in the Senate so as to embrace those additional 10. If that is to be done, I think the Senator from Mississippi should also apply to the Democratic caucus for a bill for the relief of the particular 10 Democrats who were entitled to the privileges that are now extended to the brethren on the other side of the Chamber and that were withheld by their party associates here. I do not see any reason why the Democratic Party, when it came into control of the Senate, should expend more money in conducting its operations than was deemed necessary by our Republican brethren when they had charge.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh! I thought the Senator from Arkansas was through.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I am sure the Senator did. I was not interesting him, and it was very natural for him to suppose that I was through, or ought to have been through.

I simply wanted to bring out the fact that there has been a gross discrimination practiced against 10 Democratic Senators by the proposition that is now made; and to be entirely consistent about it you ought to extend an additional clerkship to every Senator on that side of the Chamber who is not the chairman of a committee—about 25 of them.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. WILLIAMS addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. To whom does the Senator from Arkansas yield?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator from Utah for the present. I shall be glad to hear what the Senator from Mississippi has to say a little later.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator is mistaken when he says that there are 10 Senators of the minority that were not taken care of before the Democratic Party came into power. I call his attention to the fact that there were 21 committees——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Eleven of them were the old well-known minority committees.

Mr. SMOOT. Eleven of them were well-known minority committees. Then there were given to the majority three other committees formerly called minority committees, and I will call attention to which committees they were. They were the Committee on Corporations Organized in the District of Columbia, the Committee on Disposition of Useless Papers in Executive Departments, and the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. No, sir; those belonged to the 11 original minority committees. They have been Democratic minority committees during the long period that we were in the minority.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, they were not the 10 committees that the Senator speaks of.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Senator is drawing some distinctions that I do not recognize. I know there were 11 committees under the old régime.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to call attention to the fact that the law provides a messenger at $1,200 for the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department, and also one at $1,440 for the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice. So that all that is involved in this whole question now, so far as the Republican side of this Chamber is concerned, is about five additional clerks. On the other side, there are changes that were made by the Democratic caucus, taking the Committees on Woman Suffrage and Public Health and National Quarantine from the minority committees and making them majority committees, which of course requires that this resolution shall pass in order that they——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Of course the observations I submitted applied to general matters. These are mere matters of detail that do not affect the general result. There are 21 minority committees—possibly 24. It may be that three were subsequently added. Let us say there are 24 committees, then, that are under the control of the minority. Eleven of them are entitled to three clerks, and 10 of them are entitled to two.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, all that the Republican Party has here is the chairmanship of 20 committees. It is true that the Democratic Party gave the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] a chairmanship, and that was not charged, as I understand, to the Republican Party. That made the 21.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I am not going to quarrel with the Senator in his recital of details, because he is noted for his accuracy in respect to matters of that kind. I only dealt with the general outlines of the question. There are 21 or 24 committees that belong to the minority. Eleven of them are entitled to three clerks, and the rest are entitled to two clerks. The proposition now, as I understand, is to give each of the 10 committees an additional clerk, so as to make the whole 24 carry three clerks each.

Mr. SMOOT. All I wanted to say to the Senator was that, as far as the Republican side of the Chamber is concerned, this only involves about five additional clerks, and there are the 10 details.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. If we are going to give them five, why should we not give one to every Senator on the other side?

Mr. SMOOT. I will vote with the Senator from Arkansas to do that.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is not the proposition, however.

Mr. SMOOT. I know it is not, and therefore we are not discussing it at this particular time. But I wanted to say that that is all that is involved, because the law itself specifically provides that the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department shall have three clerks, and the law specifically provides that the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice shall have three.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I go back again to the proposition that I am not discussing details; I am discussing the outlines of the proposition that there are 24 committees to which Senators of the minority are entitled. Eleven of them carry three clerks each and the rest carry two. The proposition is to give an additional clerk to each of those 13 committees.

I say the Democratic Party has no more reason for increasing the expense of conducting the Senate than it has for increasing that of any other department of the Government. If there are reasons for it, they ought to be made known; and it ought to be shown why the increases stop at these paper committees and do not extend to the individual Senators.

I am making a plea for the justice of the proposition as it was applied to our Democratic brethren over here during the years that they enjoyed these nominal chairmanships. If there are reasons for it, they ought to be made known; and we will respond according to the justice of the disclosures as they are presented to us.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the facts of the matter are these: There are 10 details that have always been allowed the minority outside of the 1 detail that went to the conference committee, which, of course, is provided for by law. There are also 5 others, making 15 committees that are already provided for. We are given 20 minority committees, not counting the one of the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER]. Therefore, Mr. President, as I said before, it will only involve an additional expenditure to take care of 5 assistant clerks if this resolution should pass, as far as the Republican side of the Chamber is concerned.

Mr. WORKS. There is no reason for allowing the chairmen of these nominal committees an extra clerk that does not apply with equal force to every Member of this body. I speak from experience. I was chairman of one of the nominal committees that had no work to do, and as a result of it I was allowed three employees in my office, and I needed them all badly. In the transmission of power to the other side of the Chamber I have lost one of those clerks. I need that help just as much now as I did when I was chairman of the committee. Serving on other important committees necessarily makes additional work for me, and depriving me of that committee, as has been done, has crippled the work in my office.

Now, that ought not to be the case with respect to any Senator. He certainly should have enough help to do his work properly in his office. This matter of allowing clerks to the chairmen of nominal committees has no reason whatever to support it unless the Senator who is chairman needs that help for other purposes. If that be so, we might just as well do the right and square thing, and allow this help to all Senators. I am sure if other Senators are situated as I am they need this additional help, and they should have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What the Senator from California has just said may or may not be a position correctly taken, but it is a position which the Republican majority did not take toward the Democratic minority. It is a position which gentlemen upon the other side have arrived at rather late in the proceeding. I went through the last Congress with but two employees. I managed to get through. I expect I have as large a correspondence as any Senator on this floor, and my office does as much work as any others except those of a few chairmen of large committees.

This is not as large an increase as appears on the face of it. There have been hitherto 10 messengers who have been detailed as committee messengers and who have acted as clerks. They have really been put upon the roll by the Senators who called for them as detailed employees. I expect that without exception these 10 men will take these places, and therefore this special-messenger list ceases to exist. These 10, of course, will be paid now under this resolution.

In reply to my friend the Senator from Arkansas, I will say that I was upon the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate with him and I opposed with him the resolution, which was just like this one. I opposed it upon the ground he has just stated, upon the general principle that a mere nominal committee should not call for assistant help for the chairman. But the Democratic caucus instructed that we should give to each committee three employees. It is true that we acted in doing that in a much more generous way toward the Republican minority than the Republican majority acted toward the Democratic minority. But it is not the fault of the committee if that be true. If it be a fault, it is the fault of the party of which the Senator from Arkansas and I are members and of the caucus which we both attended.

When you are discussing the question further, I want to say that the whole superstructure of the English-speaking race, or a great deal of it, is built upon what are called fictions of the law. It seems that wherever the English-speaking race go they begin to originate fictions of some sort in order to subserve practical purposes in a manner which will satisfy somebody demanding a theory for it. In some way in the Senate there grew up the habit of having a lot of nominal committees with nothing to do. Some of them were majority committees and some of them minority committees, and they were created with the view of giving the Senators at the head of those committees additional clerical help. I say with that view, because some of the committees are so ridiculously inoperative that nobody would give any other reason for their existence. But there was an underlying reason for it. As a rule, when a Senator comes here in his first Congress he has, compared with those who have been here longer, less work to do than they have. As he remains here his work accumulates. So the habit grew up of giving to Members in proportion to their seniority these nominal committees.

It was a rough-and-ready way of accommodating clerical assistance for the need of Senators, the supposition underlying it being that in proportion to the length of a Senator's service he needed clerical help. That is not always true. Like all fictions of the law, it is a rough-and-ready process rather than a mathematically accurate one. At any rate, that was the reason underlying it.

Now, we have all gone just this far and no further at this time. Whether we should go further or not I do not know. I do not know what the committee is going to do further, but I hope this resolution will be adopted. For the most part, it will give to those Senators who actually need help the help that they need. I do not say that that will be done in every case. I know several cases where it will not. It will not be the case with men who, owing to their identification with certain propaganda of legislation, need help. Then, I know of other cases——

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. WILLIAMS. In one moment. I know of other cases where Senators make work for themselves. They go out on a crusade and imagine that they need help to carry on the crusade. But there are cases where the man's actual work of a legislative character would demand three employees where he has only two, and they are not provided for here.

Now, I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. I wanted to ask the Senator from Mississippi if it is not true that this additional clerk applies not only to minority committees, but in some instances to majority committees?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] stated that. The division was five and five. My recollection is that it is a mistake that there are seven new clerks for the minority and three for the majority, but about that I do not pretend to be accurate. It is just an impression that I have.

Mr. FALL. I have in mind one instance. At the last session of Congress I happened to be chairman of a small committee, one of these nominal committees. It was surely a nominal committee; the committee never had a meeting and I doubt whether the committee will ever have a meeting. That committee had a clerk and a stenographer at the last session. Under this resolution that committee, which is now a majority committee, as it was at that time, will have three. The committee does not need three. The chairman of the committee, in my judgment, should have the three. Doubtless he will need them. The same is true with regard to other Senators. So, far from this being a discrimination, or as the Senator from Arkansas seemed to suggest, something that is being extended to Republicans that was not extended to the Democrats by the Republicans, I simply wanted to call the attention of the Senator from Mississippi to this one committee that I speak of. It was a majority committee at the last session, with only two employees, and it is a majority committee at this session, with only two, and it will have three under this resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. As will every other committee.

Mr. FALL. As will every other committee, I understand.

Mr. WILLIAMS. These positions are not really given to the committees for committee work; that is self-evident. They are given to them for the reason that senior Senators are supposed to have more work to do, and they claim that they are entitled to these chairmanships by seniority. That is the real logic underlying this fiction.

I hope, Mr. President, that the resolution will be passed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the Senator from Georgia wish to ask me a question?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; I thought the Senator was through. When the Senator from Mississippi is through I wish to make a few remarks.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I wish to ask the Senator from Mississippi a question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will not yield the floor completely. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I wish to ask the Senator from Mississippi a question, if the Senator will allow me. I am hardly clear as to the purpose of the resolution. I have been away from the Chamber while the Senator has been speaking and perhaps he made it clear in my absence. I understand there are certain committees of the minority that have extended to them by detail one messenger.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And there are others that have only two employees without a detail.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I understand. It is not so stated in the resolution, but the purpose is to cut off the detailed messengers——

Mr. WILLIAMS. That was the purpose.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. And allow an assistant clerk at $1,200 per annum. Yet there is nothing in the resolution to take those messengers as details from the roll of the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. They are already taken from the roll of the Senate and are now in the service of the several chairmen of committees, and we presume they will be reappointed.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That is true; but they will not be reappointed as messengers. The roll of the Senate contains so many messengers—40, we will say. Ten of those messengers are detailed, we will say, to 10 minority committees. Those particular 10 are replaced by assistant clerks, leaving just 40 places upon the Senate roll, but only 30 of those places filled.

There is nothing in the resolution to cut off those 10 additional places and make the saving which the Senator is aiming at. Ought there not to be something in it to state the fact affirmatively that when those messengers cease service with these committees the place itself shall cease upon the roll of the Senate?

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is an amendment which is proposed to be offered by the Senator from Utah which will take care of that by striking out the language "assisant clerk" and substituting the word "messenger."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am not sure that that will do it, Mr. President.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think that will take care of it, because the Sergeant at Arms will not appoint any more messengers to take the place of these.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I do not know whether he will or not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I know he will not.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. He will have the place that can be filled. What I am objecting to right now is the possible generosity which may result in taking away $1,400 places from 10 committees and giving them $1,200 places and then taking the $1,400 places and filling them up by the appointment of whoever the Sergeant at Arms may see fit to designate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I assume the Sergeant at Arms will not appoint anybody to fill the places of these vacant messengerships.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. But would it not be well to make that perfectly plain?

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will offer an amendment to make it plainer, I shall not object to it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am not drawing amendments for the Senator, but I want to call the attention of the Senator from Mississippi to a further fact. It seems to me the resolution is not perfectly plain in its statement that the messengers are to be dropped.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am perfectly certain that the Sergeant at Arms will do just what we want done, and there will be no difficulty about it. The trouble about what the Senator would want is this: All these messengers were carried upon an appropriation bill, and a Senate resolution can not abolish the position. If you were to put that in this resolution, you could not abolish the position as far as they are concerned. They are provided for. All we do is to let them be provided for upon the committee, and the Sergeant at Arms will not appoint anybody to fill their places. They are already detailed, and they are serving on the committees; and without an exception I suppose the men who are now serving will be reappointed, because when a Senator wanted a messenger detailed to him he named the man who was to be detailed to him. So practically it will work out just as we expect it to work. We could not by a mere resolution repeal a law.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Then the legislative situation would be that we have a law providing that certain men shall be paid at the rate of $1,440 per annum, and the Senate thinks that is an extravagance, and proposes to pay them out of its own contingent fund at $1,200 per annum until the end of the present fiscal year?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; until the end of the fiscal year. That is the substance of it. Now I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire, Mr. President, to enter a very brief criticism upon the plan of payment of many of the clerks of these various committees. For myself I am in favor of abolishing the committees that amount to nothing and giving a Senator the clerical aid that he needs. During the last session of Congress I was obliged to have three clerks. I had two, having no committee, and employed another, and paid the clerk myself. I do not think a Senator ought to be put in such a position. I think if a Senator, whether he is in the minority or not, needs three clerks he ought to have them, and I do not believe in using a nominal committee that is not a committee as a basis for giving them to him. I do not know that we can change it right now. It is an old custom that I speak of, but I hope we will get away from it the first time when it is possible to do so.

As illustrations, I wish to call attention to two or three gross inequalities in clerical hire furnished to Senators and furnished to committees, for which I do not believe there is a particle of excuse. I think the whole committee service and the clerical service upon committees ought to be revised and put on a rational basis. Take the Committee on Military Affairs and the Committee on Naval Affairs. They stand upon the same basis and have practically about the same work. I find that the Committee on Military Affairs is given a chief clerk at $2,500, an assistant at $2,220, another assistant at $1,440, and a messenger at $1,200. I find that the Committee on Naval Affairs has a clerk at $2,500, an assistant at $1,440, and a messenger at $1,440.

Mr. SMOOT. I suppose the Senator knows there is a great deal more work in the Committee on Military Affairs than in the Committee on Naval Affairs. There are hundreds of bills referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and there are very few meetings of the Committee on Naval Affairs, with the exception of the time when the naval appropriation bill is under consideration.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will turn to another, then. Take the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department and the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice. I find in one instance a messenger is paid $1,440 and in the other a messenger is paid $1,200. They are not messengers; they are stenographers. They ought to be given the name of the position they fill, and they ought to be paid fairly. I find one assistant clerk at $1,800——

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will pardon me, that is just one of the ills we are seeking to correct now. We make the pay of the messenger of all these subordinate committees $1,200, instead of leaving some at $1,440 and some at $1,200. This resolution covers that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. You change them all to $1,200?

Mr. WILLIAMS. We change them all to $1,200.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I find in some of the other committees the assistant clerk is paid $1,800 and in another committee he is paid $1,440. Take the Judiciary Committee. I find a clerk at $2,500, one at $2,220, one at $1,800, one at $1,800, and a messenger at $1,440. I do not believe that there is such a difference between the work of the Judiciary Committee and these other committees. It seems to me that the fair and proper rule to adopt——

Mr. BACON. I hope my colleague will read in this connection the clerical force of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I was noticing that just a moment ago. I will stop to read that and compare the two. In the Committee on Foreign Relations there are a clerk at $2,500, an assistant at $2,220, and one at $1,440, while the Judiciary Committee has two more clerks at $1,800.

Mr. President and Senators, I think that the proper and fair thing, as soon as we have an opportunity, is to take these committees and treat them fairly and squarely, abolish those which amount to nothing and retain those which are really important, and furnish clerical hire according to the service required. I hope we will in the near future come to the further proposition of giving Senators who have not committees the clerks they need.

Mr. STONE. Will the Senator from Georgia yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. STONE. What I am about to say will call for a response from the colleague of the junior Senator. The senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] is a member of the Committee on the Judiciary and the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations. I assume there are a good many more bills referred to the Committee on the Judiciary than to the Committee on Foreign Relations, but I should like to ask the opinion of the senior Senator from Georgia, who has had large experience on both committees, whether there is such a difference in the burden of work imposed on these two great committees as would require numerically nearly twice the clerical force and fully twice the cost of the clerical force as between those two committees.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, in response to the inquiry of the Senator from Missouri I would state that there is no doubt about the fact that the Committee on the Judiciary has a great deal more detailed work than the Committee on Foreign Relations, but I do not think that the Committee on the Judiciary has any large amount of work which requires greater clerical assistance than the work of the Committee on Foreign Relations requires. The Committee on the Judiciary has a great deal of work through subcommittees; I presume more so than any other committee; certainly more than any other one committee that I have had occasion to give very close observation to.

The Committee on the Judiciary has a great many judicial questions submitted to its determination which require work by subcommittees. It has a great many nominations to consider, which require work by subcommittees, and very extended hearings by subcommittees; but they do not call for clerical labor except in the way of stenographers to take down the testimony taken before those subcommittees.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They are outside.

Mr. BACON. I was about to state that in that case there is always brought in an expert stenographer for the purpose of taking down testimony. The ordinary stenographer of a committee is not competent to take down testimony given in an examination. It requires an expert stenographer, and they are always called in and paid extra.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If he is competent he has the committee's regular work to attend to, and another expert stenographer is always called in, anyhow.

Mr. BACON. Whether that is a reason or not, the other is a sufficient reason. I suppose there are a few committee stenographers who are capable of taking down testimony in the same way that our stenographers here take down the debates. There is nothing more difficult for a stenographer than the taking down of testimony where witnesses are being examined, subject to interruptions and cross-examination and conflicting questions and all that. It necessitates the utmost expertness on the part of the stenographer who takes it down. As a rule, I think, the former chairman of the committee, who sits before me, the present chairman not being now in his seat, will bear me out in the statement that in all the extended hearings, some of them lasting through months, an outside stenographer is brought in. I was on one subcommittee, I recall, that lasted a good many months; a vast volume of testimony was taken in that case; and, as in almost every other case, there was an outside stenographer called in who was an expert for that business.

So I return to the statement that while the detail work of the Judiciary Committee is very much greater than the detail work of the Foreign Relations Committee, I do not think the clerical labor required in the Judiciary Committee is materially greater, if at all greater, than the clerical work required in the Foreign Relations Committee.

I will state in this connection something that I think possibly may have to be brought to the attention of the Senate hereafter. The Foreign Relations Committee peculiarly requires a class of clerical assistance which, possibly, no other committee requires, because of the peculiar character of the questions with which it has to deal, international questions requiring sometimes very extended examinations, requiring familiarity with international law, requiring familiarity with treaties and methods of making treaties, and things of that kind. This, it seems to me, would require that the Committee on Foreign Relations should have an officer different from any which it is now authorized to employ, one possessing a higher degree of knowledge of these higher branches than is generally to be found in the case of the clerkship of a committee.

I have never moved in that regard because of the indisposition which has been manifested in what has been said by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] to call for more, now that the Democrats are in power, than was enjoyed by the Republicans when they were in power.

But I will say this: I have been for a long time—for some 10 years or more, possibly—chairman of one of these nominal committees. It is true I have been chairman, as it so happened, of committees which did have something to do, but very little compared to the more important committees. But the Foreign Relations Committee now has exactly the same force and only the force that the nominal committee had of which I have heretofore been the chairman. All that force is required for my personal work, and it is just simply that much additional work put upon them when the work of the committee is imposed upon those three employees or clerks which was formerly imposed upon them as the force of this nominal committee.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I wish to say, respecting the Judiciary Committee——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Just one word more, and then I will be through, if the Senator will yield.

I have said practically all I wish to say. Looking at the list of committees and the pay received by the different clerks of committees, it seemed to me perfectly evident that there was, at least in some instances, no regard for the services rendered in the differences of the pay. I wanted to call attention to it, and to express the hope that whenever we fix pay in the future regard shall be had to equality of service and equality of pay.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, lest it should be taken that the statement had been suggested that some of the committees had been in past Congresses having an excessive amount of help I wish to say in regard to the Judiciary Committee, having been chairman of that committee, that it is quite possible that that chairmanship having been changed and under better management less help will be required. I hope that is true. I never have compared the assistance which one committee has with another, but as long as the chairmanship of the Judiciary Committee was held by myself I have endeavored to secure for the services of that committee all the help that I thought was necessary for the proper performance of the duties of the committee, and no more. I will say now that I do not think that committee has ever had help that it did not require.

So far as comparing it with other committees is concerned I have no disposition to do that, and I have no knowledge upon which to make any comparison. I believe that every active committee of the Senate should have the help which it reasonably requires to perform its work, that it should have sufficient help and competent help.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not misunderstand me. I did not mean by anything I said to indicate that the Committee on the Judiciary had more help than it required; I did mean to indicate that the Foreign Relations Committee, which has not so much help, has not as much as it ought to have.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I was not referring to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. Now, Mr. President, if I may be pardoned——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am through.

Mr. BACON. While I am on my feet, Mr. President, I want to say that I think there is very great lack of appreciation on the part of the public, and possibly of some Senators who have not yet bent their backs to the full burden that they will have to bear, of the amount of labor that has to be done by a Senator who represents a whole State. The tendency has grown, and is continuing to increase, to devolve upon a Senator everything that is also devolved upon a Representative; in other words, a man at home is not content to get the assistance of his Representative, but the same assistance which he appeals to his Representative to give to him, he appeals to his Senator to give to him. In my State, for instance, with 12 Representatives, I have practically, sharing with my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Georgia], 12 districts, instead of 1, and the amount of labor which is imposed and the amount of clerical work which is required are immense.

Not only so, Mr. President, but the functions of the Federal Government have been so enlarged that I think it is not unreasonable or extravagant to say that a Senator has from two to three times as much work to do as a Senator had when I first became a Member of this body. I did not so fully realize that until some time ago in hearing a remark made by a Senator who served during the early part of my service here, who went out of the Senate, and came back. The work has grown gradually upon those who have remained here all of this time, and we hardly appreciate what the increase has been; but a Senator who went out and who was gone from the Chamber for six or eight years and came back, said to me when he came back that there was twice as much for him to do as there was in his former service.

The rolls of the Senate may appear to be large, but when it is considered what immense constituencies we represent, what immense interests we are called upon to deal with, what varied and almost innumerable functions of the Government we have to be constantly in the consideration of and in the dealing with, it is not to be wondered at that a very much larger force is required than was heretofore required and a much larger force than those who are not familiar with all these conditions may think to be necessary.

I do not know of any committee that has more assistance than it needs. When a Senator has an important committee and attends to the work of that committee, which is very great, and when he has, in addition to that, his own work to attend to, the clerical force required for him in order to properly attend to his committee work and to his personal work must necessarily be very large.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to say that it was not my purpose to criticize the number of clerical aids given to the Judiciary Committee. I was simply calling attention to the fact that there was an inequality in the distribution of the help to committees. I also wish to express the opinion that we ought to be willing to give every Senator, whether he has a committee or not, and although he is in the minority, the clerical help that he requires. He uses it to serve his people at home; he uses it in response to demands made upon him from home by his people. Without regard to the length of service of Senators, I think they each need more than two employees.

I found three could scarcely keep up with the demands from my home during the first two years of my service, and three now do not keep up with it, without any committee work at all to do. Having three and having a chairmanship, yet with no calls from the committee for service by my force, three do not attend to the demands from my home, from the people, to answer their letters and to look after matters in the departments about which they write to me; and their letters, I think, are entitled to a response, and to attention in the departments. I think it is poor economy to object to furnishing the force in a Senator's office necessary to look after the business of his constituents at home which they place upon their Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator that, if his experience is the same as mine, he must receive hundreds and thousands of letters from people outside of his

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is an amendment which is proposed to be offered by the Senator from Utah which will take care of that by striking out the language "assisant clerk" and substituting the word "messenger."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am not sure that that will do it, Mr. President.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think that will take care of it, because the Sergeant at Arms will not appoint any more messengers to take the place of these.

Mr. BACON. While I am on my feet, Mr. President, I want to say that I think there is very great lack of appreciation on the part of the public, and possibly of some Senators who have not yet bent their backs to the full burden that they will have to bear, of the amount of labor that has to be done by a Senator who represents a whole State. The tendency has grown, and is continuing to increase, to devolve upon a Senator everything that is also devolved upon a Representative; in other words, a man at home is not content to get the assistance of his Representative, but the same assistance which he appeals to his Representative to give to him, he appeals to his Senator to give to him. In my State, for instance, with 12 Representatives, I have practically, sharing with my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Georgia], 12 districts, instead of 1, and the amount of labor which is imposed and the amount of clerical work which is required are immense.

Not only so, Mr. President, but the functions of the Federal Government have been so enlarged that I think it is not unreasonable or extravagant to say that a Senator has from two to three times as much work to do as a Senator had when I first became a Member of this body. I did not so fully realize that until some time ago in hearing a remark made by a Senator who served during the early part of my service here, who went out of the Senate, and came back. The work has grown gradually upon those who have remained here all of this time, and we hardly appreciate what the increase has been; but a Senator who went out and who was gone from the Chamber for six or eight years and came back, said to me when he came back that there was twice as much for him to do as there was in his former service.

The rolls of the Senate may appear to be large, but when it is considered what immense constituencies we represent, what immense interests we are called upon to deal with, what varied and almost innumerable functions of the Government we have to be constantly in the consideration of and in the dealing with, it is not to be wondered at that a very much larger force is required than was heretofore required and a much larger force than those who are not familiar with all these conditions may think to be necessary.

I do not know of any committee that has more assistance than it needs. When a Senator has an important committee and attends to the work of that committee, which is very great, and when he has, in addition to that, his own work to attend to, the clerical force required for him in order to properly attend to his committee work and to his personal work must necessarily be very large.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to say that it was not my purpose to criticize the number of clerical aids given to the Judiciary Committee. I was simply calling attention to the fact that there was an inequality in the distribution of the help to committees. I also wish to express the opinion that we ought to be willing to give every Senator, whether he has a committee or not, and although he is in the minority, the clerical help that he requires. He uses it to serve his people at home; he uses it in response to demands made upon him from home by his people. Without regard to the length of service of Senators, I think they each need more than two employees.

I found three could scarcely keep up with the demands from my home during the first two years of my service, and three now do not keep up with it, without any committee work at all to do. Having three and having a chairmanship, yet with no calls from the committee for service by my force, three do not attend to the demands from my home, from the people, to answer their letters and to look after matters in the departments about which they write to me; and their letters, I think, are entitled to a response, and to attention in the departments. I think it is poor economy to object to furnishing the force in a Senator's office necessary to look after the business of his constituents at home which they place upon their Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator that, if his experience is the same as mine, he must receive hundreds and thousands of letters from people outside of his home State. In fact, my mail to-day has at least as many letters from other States of the Union as it does from the State of Utah. I have always tried to attend to those just the same as I do those from my own home State, and I suppose that is the case with almost every other Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have not had the experience of being called upon to look after matters in the departments from other States, but I have had many inquiries about pending legislation and matters connected with legislation, information wished, all of which I endeavor to answer. I have never had less than one additional clerk in my office employed and paid by myself.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, I think some of the Senators, at least, who are now chairmen of minority committees and who have had assigned to them from the Senate a messenger at $1,440 will be surprised to learn in this innocent resolution, which, upon its face, gave them one more clerk at $1,200, is really intended to cut down the messenger they now have to $1,200. That is the purpose as indicated by the chairman of the committee presenting the resolution.

Mr. President, I think what has already been stated by the two Senators from Georgia has indicated pretty clearly to the minds of most Senators that those who are engaged to do the work of the constituents of a Senator's own State are more than mere messengers. In my own office I know either they have got to brief cases or I have got to brief them for a great many people who are asking me for information and for opinions upon laws and upon cases which they present, where the decisions are against them in some land case or something of that character, so that I can present the cases to the Secretary of the Interior or to some other Secretary. So the class of clerks that we use, messengers included, are a class that must be capable once in a while of going to the departments and attending to cases for a Senator where the Senator can not possibly leave the Senate Chamber or leave the business connected with it.

Mr. President, the messengers that are employed to hand in cards for some one who wants to call a Senator out are receiving $1,440, but under this resolution the clerk whom you are to use in your committee and who is supposed to be competent to do the kind of work that will be required of him is to receive but $1,200.

I think every Senator who has clerks credited to him will agree with me that he needs certainly as intelligent men in his committee as are needed to hand cards into the Senate Chamber. I do not believe that we ought to cut any of them down to a meager $1,200 salary, and I am going to move to amend the resolution offered by the Senator by striking out the $1,200 item and inserting in lieu thereof $1,440. I offer that as an amendment.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, as I understand, the chairman of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate is going to hold further meetings in reference to the question of granting an additional clerk to all of the Senators. Am I correct about that?

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the Senator's inquiry?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Do I understand the chairman of the committee to say that he is going to hold further meetings or hold a further meeting in reference to the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I distinctly stated, in answer to a question by the Senator from Washington—perhaps the Senator from Michigan was not then in his seat—that at the last meeting of the committee a resolution was passed that that particular resolution be taken up at the next meeting, which will be on Saturday next. The Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate has a regular meeting every Saturday.

In that connection, by the way, I want to say that some complaint has been made about these men receiving $1,200 a year. That committee has a great deal of work to do, and it ought to have if it is properly attended to. They were in session last Saturday about five hours, and the clerk of that committee receives, or its messenger who does stenographic work corresponding to the position named in this resolution receives, only $1,200.

Going back to the question asked by the Senator, I can only repeat what I said to the Senator from Washington, that on Saturday next this resolution comes up for consideration again, and I think the whole committee will at that meeting dispose of it one way or another. It may not get through discussing it and may carry it over to another meeting, but I think they will dispose of it one way or another. That is my opinion.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to ask the Senator from Mississippi a question. Does he not believe that the messenger he speaks of, who is a stenographer, should receive $1,440?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I do not. I can get him for $1,200, and he is a remarkably good stenographer. He does his work splendidly.

In connection with what the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] has said about somebody here at $1,440 a year handing in a card and somebody being a stenographer at $1,200, that may be a very good argument on either one of the two sides. It might be an argument to raise the salary of one; it might be an argument to reduce the salary of the other. Those incongruities have nothing to do with this proposition. I could get up and spend a week talking about incongruities of payment not only in the service of the Senate but all over the world. A good tailor receives more money sometimes than does a good lawyer.

Mr. WARREN. May I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator, I presume, admits that the cost of living has advanced in the last few years to some extent?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. Does it look quite compatible with that idea that the compensation of help should be reduced in price by $240 a year?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, there were two reasons for that. We are reducing some of them, and some of them are remaining where they were. The position with this committee, for example, has been $1,200 all the time. Such positions with a great many of these nominal committees have paid $1,200 a year all the time. Some of them were $1,440. We thought we ought to make them all $1,440 or else make all of them $1,200, and we decided to make all of them $1,200.

Mr. WARREN. May I offer one explanation there? The matter of $1,200 salary was introduced really not over two years ago, when an additional clerk or messenger was allowed because of the growing business, I assume, at that time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think the Senator is mistaken. I have been on the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate only two years, because I have been a Member of the Senate only that long, but I understand that this one employee has always been paid $1,200 and that committee has always had a third man.

Mr. WARREN. I am not prepared to say as to that now, but I think the Senator is mistaken certainly as to the general line of clerks. We have very few employees at $1,200 and they were authorized quite recently. For instance, I recall that all the clerks of this grade were receiving $1,440 when two committees asked that one clerk should be raised at the expense of the other because the messenger would simply act perhaps as a laborer or perform no clerical work, his duties being rather to wait on the committee. In those cases—I refer to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Committee on Claims—because of the circumstances it was thought that the second clerk should have more than the third clerk, but otherwise they have all received $1,440. As I have said, something like two years ago there were some additions made at $1,200.

Of course, personally, I propose to be satisfied with whatever may be permitted me. The fact that I have been cut to half the usual number of clerks and have to pay some of them myself is the fortune or misfortune of political warfare, the result of the changes of politics, and I do not propose to make any complaint; but it is a bit ungracious, after the minority committees for more than 20 years have had messengers detailed from the roll of the Sergeant at Arms at $1,440—it has been the same whether the majority was Democratic or Republican—that immediately after this change, just at this time, and especially in view of the admitted fact, if you please, that the cost of living has advanced in the last 20 years, and, as stated by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], the work of Senators has increased very greatly—it does seem, I repeat, a little ungracious to reduce the rate of compensation of clerks allotted to the senior minority Members of the Senate who are, of course, occupying places on important committees that require a great deal of work.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I am satisfied that when the Senator from Wyoming comes to think more about it he will conclude that he had no right to say that the present majority has been acting "ungraciously" to the minority.

Mr. WARREN. I did not say that anyone had acted ungraciously, but I said it seemed rather ungracious to insist now upon the change. I leave it with the Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then, the Senator will regret that he said "it seemed ungracious"——

Mr. WARREN. If it annoys the Senator I will withdraw it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Because it ought to seem very gracious to him for us to give a third man on some six or seven committees more than the minority on this side ever had, and it was done by a resolution of the Democratic caucus, showing that it was party action. So much for that.

Mr. WARREN. May I say to the Senator right there that he is not only adding a third man to a small number of minority committees but he is adding a third man to several committees of the majority——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that.

Mr. WARREN. That this side of the Senate did not formerly allow.

Mr. WILLIAMS. We are adding a third man to about seven minority committees and to about three majority committees. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has it five and five; but I think, when he looks over it, he will find that he is in error.

Now, I want to say this: Of course I sympathize with you gentlemen over there. You have been in the majority, and while you were in the majority every one of you had three employees. You are not in the habit of being in the minority.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator is mistaken about our having three employees.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; the Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thought you all had three employees. I thought every one of you was chairman of some committee.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I did not have three clerks.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very few of you, then, did not.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in order that the RECORD may be correct, I want to say that there are nine committees of the majority—the Committee on Coast and Insular Survey, the Committee on Enrolled Bills, the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture, the Committee on Expenditures in the Departments of Commerce and Labor, the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of State, the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game, the Committee on National Banks, the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine, and the Committee on Woman Suffrage—nine committees of the majority and five of the minority.

Mr. STONE. What about them?

Mr. SMOOT. That are increased from two to three clerks.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well; perhaps I am mistaken about that; but, at any rate, whatever it gives you, it gives you more than you ever gave us. It does not make much difference how much more, but it does give you more.

I was about to say that I feel sorry for you in a certain sense. You can not reverse a great national engine without disturbing the comfort of some of the passengers upon the train, especially if they are passengers in a Pullman car, who have been in the habit of enjoying the utmost luxuries of every description. It is more unpleasant to them than it is to the fellow in the ordinary local coach, where the smoking is done at the end of the train. You get in the habit of having this assistance and it is very hard for you to leave it off, whereas this side was educated in the business of helping itself to the utmost extent possible.

I have just passed through two years with two men, one of them, by the way, receiving $1,200 a year—not even $1,440—and the other man, I think, receiving $1,800; but whatever it was, we managed to get along. It is true there were three of us—those two and I; we made the three, and I did a good deal of the work. It is not intended that Senators should do no work of a clerical character at all. They get help, they get aid and assistance, but not substitutes. I especially feel sorry for Senators who were chairmen of important committees and had four and sometimes five assistants, who have come down now to three and, in some cases, to two. My heart goes out to you; but the Democratic Party has gallivanted around the country through its stump speakers and has announced that it proposes to economize in governmental expenditures. The expenses of the Senate of the United States are per annum ten times those of the House of Lords; and the minute we have a change in the administration you begin to crowd us to increase the expenditures, instead of cutting them off.

Now, we have a double duty to perform, and one of the duties conflicts with our affections. We have a duty to you, and we have a duty to the country, and our duty to the country may now and then conflict with our affection for you. We will try to bring the two as near as we can in unity and do the best we can for you, but just at this time this seems to me a pretty good thing for us to do. There are Senators like the Senator from Michigan——

Mr. OLIVER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think I have the floor, Mr. President, and I have not yielded.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not know the Senator had the floor.

Mr. OLIVER. I was about to ask who had the floor, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not know the Senator from Michigan had the floor or I would not have made so long an interruption. I thought I myself had the floor. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I asked the chairman of the committee whether or not he had had all the hearings that he required on this particular subject. I think he undoubtedly has. I think he knows to-day how he feels on granting an additional clerk to every Senator who does not have a chairmanship, either nominal or otherwise. I think there can be no argument advanced against granting every Senator, whether he has a committee chairmanship or not, such help as he actually needs in doing the work of a Senator. I think the Senator himself can recall a number of Senators, perhaps a great many Senators, on this side of the Chamber who are now without committee chairmanships, who have quite as much work to do as the Senators who hold chairmanships of nominal committees. So, it seems to me that these two things should go together.

I am not finding any fault with the granting of additional committee employees to Senators who have minority committees. I think they are entitled to them. I want them to have them. If we could not get the two, and my proposition to amend the resolution would defeat that, I should not offer it, because I trust that I am not so selfish that I would say, because I could not have just what I wanted, that some other Senator could not have what he can get and what he needs. But the two Senators from Georgia, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], and other Senators have expressed the true situation, namely, that the Senator who has the work to do should not be denied a clerk because he does not happen to be fortunate enough to have the chairmanship of a committee which has nothing to do.

So it seems to me, Mr. President, that what we ought to do at this time is to amend this resolution so as to incorporate in it the proposition to grant each Senator an additional clerk. I know that I need such help; I know that other Senators here situated as I am need it, and that their work can not be completely performed or as near completely performed without the extra help as it can be with it. So if I thought that we would have an adverse report next Saturday, as it seems to me the Senator from Mississippi clearly intimates we will have, and possibly that the resolution may be indefinitely postponed, I would make the motion now to amend the resolution, and I think I will do so. I move to amend the resolution——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state there is now pending an amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Then I will withhold my amendment until the other amendment is disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota to the amendment proposed by the committee. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 19, it is proposed to amend the committee amendment by striking out "$1,200" and in lieu inserting "$1,440."

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I want to say merely that I hope that amendment will be defeated. The committee considered that question very carefully and arrived at the conclusion stated in the resolution for reasons that seemed abundantly satisfactory.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment to the amendment. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. KENYON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, as I understand, this amendment is to provide 2 clerks at $1,440. It is increasing the amount of compensation from $1,200 to $1,440.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. BRISTOW. I desire to say that committees that have had 3 employees heretofore have had a clerk at $2,220, a messenger at $1,440, and a stenographer at $1,200.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Oh, no.

Mr. MCCUMBER. At $1,440.

Mr. BRISTOW. No; that is a mistake. I am thoroughly familiar with it. It has been $1,200. There have not been—unless there are exceptions—two $1,440 clerks given to nominal committees. When the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate during the last two years has allowed a third employee, it has always been at $1,200 a year.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator that this change will apply to the 10 detailed employees who have always been paid at the rate of $1,440 per year. What the Senator says in relation to the others is correct, with perhaps one single exception that I now recall, and that is the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, which has two employees at $1,440. What he says in relation to the others—as to their salary being $1,200—is true, but the 10 detailed men have received $1,440 a year, and the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice had 2 employees at $1,440. These 11 committees are included in this resolution.

Mr. BRISTOW. Well, why should the details be any different now from what they were heretofore? This resolution is not intended to apply to any committees that have already three employees; it is intended to apply to those that have only two.

Mr. SMOOT. No; the Senator is wrong. If he will read the resolution he will find that it does apply to those committees. It specifically names the committees, and says that there shall be an assistant clerk at $1,200 for those particular committees. If the Senate will vote for the pending amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], then it will not change the salary paid to the men detailed to those different committees. If it is reduced to $1,200, then, of course——

Mr. BRISTOW. Why should the third clerk of one nominal committee get more than the third clerk of another?

Mr. SMOOT. If the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota is adopted, then they will all receive $1,440.

Mr. BRISTOW. Then, why should we increase the salaries of these stenographers when there has been no demand for it in the past?

Mr. SMOOT. There are a few increases from $1,200 to $1,440, but the majority of these are no increases whatsoever.

Mr. BRISTOW. Why should we pass this resolution, protecting these details, when every clerk of a minority Senator who has had a committee heretofore has been reduced from $2,220 to $2,000, and his stenographer has been reduced from $1,440 to $1,200? Why should we have some special legislation to protect simply the details, when the others are not protected? If you are going to raise the salary of everybody whose salary has been reduced by virtue of the change in the organization of the Senate, let us treat them all alike and make all of these clerkships of all of the Senators $2,220.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will permit me, I think he misunderstands what the Senator has said. Heretofore—it has gone back as far as I remember, twenty-odd years—there have been certain minority Senators, usually the senior members of the minority, that have had a third man—a messenger—detailed at $1,440. In the detail by the Sergeant at Arms there were 10 additional messengers put on that list, or Sergeant at Arms' roll, that were kept there because of this detail. So that now the 10 senior members of the minority side have the detail of those messengers exactly as both parties have heretofore done for twenty-odd years or more.

If this resolution should be construed exactly as it reads in the last sentence, and it is understood that those who have but three clerks now should not be disturbed, it would be according to the Senator's plan. But if we are to have withdrawn these messengers, and in their places put the $1,200 messengers, of course it makes $240 less for each of nine places.

While I am on my feet, if the Senator will permit me, I should like to say that I think it would be a great deal better for our manner of appropriation, and better for the good feeling and understanding between House and Senate, if these salaries were allowed to run on, to the end of the appropriations already made at least, even if they are to be reduced after that, as to those nine men.

The appropriations have carried for the balance of this year and all of next year, between 14 and 15 months, for the 9 messengers that are on the rolls at $1,440, and are detailed to these 9 Senators. To take those off and put on 9 men at $1,200 puts a drain on our Senate contingent fund of just that amount of money, and leaves the Sergeant at Arms free, if he chooses, to fill those $1,440 messenger places and use them.

Mr. BRISTOW. But there would not be any substance in it when we are saving $240 a year on each clerk. But this proposition is not a fair one, and I want to call the attention of Senators to it.

There are 23 minority Senators here whose clerks heretofore have been receiving $2,220 and whose messengers received $1,440. In consequence of the change in the majority of the Senate the salaries of the clerks to the 23 Senators who do not have chairmanships have been reduced to $2,000. Their messengers have been reduced from $1,440 to $1,200. If this resolution passes as reported by the committee, the same thing would happen to the 9 or 10 details. Why should not the details be treated in the same way and the same rule be applied to them that is applied to all these other employees?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, for the simple reason that they never have been treated that way for the last 20 years. These detailed messengers to Senators in the minority have always received $1,440 each.

Mr. BRISTOW. Will the Senator from Utah tell me why a nominal committee that is presided over by a minority chairman should have two clerks at $1,440, while a nominal committee presided over by a majority chairman should have one clerk at $1,440 and a clerk at $1,200? I do not care if it has been done for 20 years. How can you justify it?

Mr. SMOOT. The theory has always been, not only upon the Democratic side but upon the Republican side as well, that the senior Members of this body are on the more important committees and therefore require some additional help. It has been upon that theory, and that only, that this extra clerk has been detailed to them, and they have always been at $1,440.

Mr. BRISTOW. And 20 of the senior members on the minority side, because of that seniority, are given chairmanships, with a clerk at $1,440 and a clerk at $2,220.

Mr. WARREN. No; a clerk at $2,220 and a messenger.

Mr. BRISTOW. Well, a messenger; but the messenger is really a clerk. That is a misnomer. I do not know why he is called a messenger. He is not a messenger. He is simply an assistant to the clerk of the committee. Then they have a clerk or stenographer at $1,200.

Mr. SMOOT. That is not the case now, Mr. President. It will be the case if this resolution passes. But until the resolution passes the only committees that would have the 3 are the detailed 10 and whatever the law provides. I think there are about 3 other committees that the law provides shall have 3 clerks, and that is all that would have them.

Mr. BRISTOW. This resolution simply puts every minority committee upon exactly the same footing.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no, Mr. President.

Mr. WARREN. All but two of them.

Mr. BRISTOW. Well, all but two; that is true. I will say that the conference of the minority is on a different basis, but this is a fight to protect nine details from the operation of the change of administration of the Senate, and for nothing else, excepting them and maintaining them in the $1,440 positions which they had heretofore, while every other minority clerk suffers the reduction which comes from a change in the party management of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President; the Senator is wrong. If the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] is adopted, they will all receive $1,440. There will not be any discrimination at all. But if the resolution passes as reported from the committee, then instead of all of them having $1,440, as would be the case if we adopt the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota, they would all be cut to $1,200.

Mr. BRISTOW. And then, of course, there are majority committees that have three clerks.

Mr. SMOOT. This applies to all the committees.

Mr. BRISTOW. So that the proposition is to increase the salary of the third employee of every committee that has three clerks.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. BRISTOW. And leave 23 minority Senators, many of whom are just as busy as those who have committees, with one clerk at $2,000, and an assistant clerk at $1,200. There is not anything fair about it.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator of course understands that that question is to be decided by the Senate. The chairman of the committee has already said that it would be considered by the committee, and no doubt, in his opinion, it would be reported to the Senate, either adversely or favorably, as the case may be.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, stating my own position, I believe we should have no clerk at less than $1,440. You may call these clerks messengers if you see fit. As a matter of fact, they are clerks, and they are doing clerical duty. We have been assigned clerks at $1,440. We have appointed those clerks at $1,440. The effect of this resolution is to cut them down to $1,200, or a loss of $20 a month, or $240 a year. That is the effect of it.

I know the clerk that I am using, the one that I have selected now to hold this position, as indicated by the Senator in charge of the resolution, would undoubtedly be reappointed under the new resolution, but he would be reappointed with a salary less than he supposed he was getting when he was appointed, and to which I think he is entitled.

I have selected men who can do work for me, and who are of some assistance, who are worth their $1,440, and doubly so when we know that at least once a year they have got to travel a distance of 3,000 miles and pay their expenses there and back.

I will vote with the Senator to put every one of these clerical places upon a basis of $1,440 where the duties are anything other than that of mere messenger. I am certain that there is not a Senator here who has an employee who does not ask that employee to do clerical work that requires judgment and discretion and intelligence and a proper method of handling business. This being the case, I do not believe the majority are justified in cutting down these places to $1,200, when during all of the previous 20 years the same places have been at $1,440. But independently of that, the nature of the work is such as to justify the appointment of clerks who are capable of earning that much.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum, in order that the full Senate may be present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The absence of a quorum being suggested by the Senator from Mississippi, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Dillingham	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ariz.
Bacon	Fall	Myers	Smith, Ga.
Bankhead	Fletcher	Nelson	Smith, S. C.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I desire to state that my colleague, the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], is necessarily absent from the Senate on important business.

Mr. SHIVELY. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. KERN] is detained from the Senate on important business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The Secretary will call the roll on the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I ask that the amendment may be reported to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 19, it is proposed to strike out "$1,200" and in lieu thereof to insert "$1,440."

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I desire to inquire what was the language of the resolution before it was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. Was there any change made in the resolution by the committee?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The committee struck out the entire resolution and offered a substitute.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, I should like to have read that part of the resolution in which the amendment comes, so that we will understand the full meaning of it.

The SECRETARY. After the naming of certain committees insert the words:

> Are hereby authorized to employ one assistant clerk each, at $1,200 per annum.

It is now proposed to strike out "$1,200" and in lieu thereof to insert "$1,440."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that is the amount of the original resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRADLEY (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN]. I therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the affirmative). I observe that the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] has not voted. I therefore withdraw my vote, having a general pair with him.

Mr. CLAPP. Owing to the absence of my general pair, I decline to vote on this question.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to announce the following pairs:

Mr. BURLEIGH with Mr. OWEN.
Mr. CATRON with Mr. SHAFROTH.
Mr. ROOT with Mr. THOMAS.
Mr. SHERMAN with Mr. SMITH of Maryland.
Mr. SMITH of Michigan with Mr. REED.
Mr. STEPHENSON with Mr. LEA.
Mr. DU PONT with Mr. CULBERSON.
Mr. JACKSON with Mr. CHILTON.

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 32, as follows:

YEAS—30.

Bankhead	Goff	Martine, N. J.	Sterling

So Mr. MCCUMBER's amendment to the amendment of the committee was rejected.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment:

In line 19, on page 2, strike out "$1,200" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,440"; and in connection with the same amendment, at the end thereof, add the following:

Provided, That all clerks or messengers of the several committees of the Senate who are receiving a salary of less than $1,400 shall be paid a salary of $1,440 per annum.

This amendment will place all clerks and messengers—those of the majority and those of the minority—on exactly the same basis, at the rate of $1,440 per annum.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, as I understand, the resolution offered by the Senator from North Dakota is subject to a point of order. Substantially the same resolution was just before the Senate and was voted down. The Senator can not bring up the same matter in different parts of the resolution whenever he gets ready.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I think the Senator could not have distinctly heard the amendment. The previous amendment that I proposed was to the effect that the nine committees mentioned in the resolution should have clerks whose salaries should be $1,440 instead of $1,200.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But there are more than nine committees mentioned in the resolution.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Well, whatever number there are.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator did not name the committees in his amendment.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Yes; but the committees are named there. The present amendment provides that all shall be paid at the rate of $1,440 per annum, and I intend to have it cover the clerks and messengers of all Senators, whether they have committees or not. The previous amendment related to only a certain number. This amendment relates to all of them.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And the previous amendment related to all the committees mentioned in this amendment, did it not?

Mr. MCCUMBER. Yes; and this amendment relates to all the committees of the Senate and to the clerks and messengers of Senators.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If that be the case, of course it is a different proposition.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I desire to supplement the point of order raised by the Senator from Mississippi by saying that the latter part of the amendment now offered by the Senator from North Dakota is not in order for another reason. It is the statutory law that no such amendment shall be passed on by the Senate until it has been referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. I will read the section of the Revised Statutes which covers that proposition:

Hereafter no payment shall be made from the contingent fund of the Senate unless sanctioned by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, or from the contingent fund of the House of Representatives unless sanctioned by the Committee on Accounts of the House of Representatives.

That is a self-imposed limitation on the power of each House of Congress, and very wisely imposed, for the purpose of preventing these appeals that are based on personal considerations and committing the Senate to a bad precedent. It is conclusive, then, of the proposition.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not think the Senator will really insist upon that point of order. If that were true, we could make no amendments to the original resolution.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. We can not make any amendment that provides for the appropriation of money from the contingent fund of the Senate, as the statute limits the authority of the Senate in that respect.

Mr. McCUMBER. This resolution was referred to the committee, and the Senator will hardly claim that when the committee has reported it back every amendment must go back to the committee to be acted on.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. If it proposes a payment out of the contingent fund, the law sustains the contention that it does.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senator would ask for a very strange rule that would come up to bother him exceedingly in the future.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. It has already come up in the Democratic caucus. The amendment now proposed was before the Senators on this side of the Chamber. An effort in this direction was made by the former Senator from Kentucky, Mr. Paynter. On a point of order being raised that the scope of the resolution could not be widened so as to include items not considered by the committee, the Vice President then presiding, Mr. Sherman, sustained the point of order.

Mr. McCUMBER. That was an original resolution.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. You are proposing to amend it by including new items of appropriation, introducing a new limitation, when the statute provides that no payments shall be made from the contingent fund without a report from the committee.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am proposing to amend the resolution which has been referred to the committee and reported back to the Senate.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. There is no reference in the statute to its being referred, but to payment. Let me read it again.

Mr. LODGE. Before the Senator does that, may I ask him a question?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I will be glad to answer.

Mr. LODGE. Do I understand the Senator to take the ground that a report of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate is not amendable?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. It is amendable with reference to matters submitted to the committee, but it is not by adding independent items, because that would make it a violation of the specific terms of the statute of the United States.

Mr. LODGE. This is a proposition to add a new item.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. To increase the expenditure from the contingent fund by a new item.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. We passed upon that. I do not make a point of order against that; but there is another point against it. We voted down the same proposition. So the whole amendment is subject to a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I offer the following amendment——

Mr. WILLIAMS. In the original resolution which went to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses certain committees were named. They were certain of these nominal committees, and the Committee to Audit and Control, having jurisdiction over the matter, put upon the resolution the other nominal committees. Now, the Committee to Audit and Control never had under consideration any other committees except those named in the original resolution, and those named in the amendment to the resolution by the committee. The Senator offers to bring in a separate and independent item including all the committees of the Senate, the matters never having been under consideration by the Committee to Audit and Control.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It has been ruled out of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I beg pardon.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I move to add at the end of the last line the following words:

That each minority Senator not the chairman of a committee be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ one assistant clerk at $1,200 per annum, to be paid from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate until otherwise provided for by law.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I raise the same point of order on that. The matter has not been considered by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If the Chair will withhold for a moment, does the chairman of the committee say that this matter has not been before his committee and has not been considered by it?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It has not been reported by the committee.

Mr. TOWNSEND. But it has been before the committee and considered by the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It has not been acted upon by the committee either way, and of course the law requires that it shall be sent there for action.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It was sent there for action.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. It was not sanctioned by the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It has to be sanctioned by the committee.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Do I understand the Senator to contend that if a resolution is sent to the committee and the committee refuses to act upon it——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no; you can move to discharge the committee and take up the matter, I suppose; but I do not think you can offer it as an amendment upon this resolution.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, it seems to me it is only fair that both this question and the one which is so closely allied to it should be considered together and should be reported by that committee and acted upon at the same time. I move that the resolution be recommitted to the Committee on Contingent Expenses with instructions that the resolution proposing to give each Senator an additional clerk at $1,200 a year be reported in connection with it. I am not saying how it shall be reported, but that it shall be reported at the same time, in connection with it, so that both propositions may be considered.

I will say that should be done as a matter of simple justice, Mr. President. There is no need of going into details here, but it is known in the Senate that a number of the committees to which it is now proposed to assign an additional clerk are not working committees. They are committees which from the first day of the session to the last, and session after session, hold no meetings whatever. It is an indirect way of giving the chairmen of those committees additional help, which I admit they need, but it is equally true that Senators who do not happen to be at the head of one of these nominal committees that never meet are in exactly the same position with reference to needing additional help that the Senators are who happen to be at the head of one of these committees with no duties to perform. To give the committees that are mere names additional clerks when the real purpose is to give the chairmen of the committees additional help, and leave Senators who need this additional help out of consideration entirely, on its face lacks an element of equity and fairness all around.

I think that we ought to dispose of this subject at one time, and the situation is one in which it will be manifestly unfair to deal with one part of it only and leave the other in the air. The resolution that is before the Committee on Contingent Expenses but not yet reported, I think, ought to be here when we act upon this resolution. That is why I move to recommit the present resolution and that the committee be directed to report the other resolution one way or the other, so that we may consider them together.

Mr. JONES. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES. I trust the Senator from South Dakota will not insist upon that motion. While I think the two propositions ought to be acted upon together, I do not think we ought to delay action upon this resolution which gives help to Senators who do need the help. We have the assurance of the Senator from Mississippi that in his judgment the committee will act on this other proposition next Saturday.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I had not heard that.

Mr. JONES. He assured us that in his judgment the committee would act.

Mr. TOWNSEND. He has not given the assurance.

Mr. JONES. He said that in his judgment the committee would act. He did not assure us positively that it would act—I do not want to misrepresent him—but he did say that he thought it would act, and I know the Senator from Mississippi well enough to believe that his committee will act next Saturday one way or the other.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Very well, Mr. President.

Mr. JONES. At any rate, I do not think we ought to hold up this proposition. Senators need this help, and I do not think we ought to hold it up. I believe the committee will act one way or the other next Saturday on this proposition.

Mr. CRAWFORD. With the assurance that it will receive consideration——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I am not to be intimidated into anything. I have given such a statement as I thought was correct to at least two Senators upon the floor. If the Senator wants to recommit the resolution and has the votes to do it, let it be done. He might have some difficulty in getting it out again if he chooses to do that.

I rather wonder why the Senator did not make this argument during the last Congress. As far as giving any renewed assurance is concerned, I think I have given about as near an assurance as I propose to give. I could only give my opinion as to what the course of the committee would be, and I do not propose to give any assurance of any sort.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do not desire to have any discussion over that matter and wander from the real merit of the claim for this additional help. I do not understand that there was any proposition before the last Congress to give these nominal committees additional help.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is true.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It is here now, and this other question is connected with it. I simply wish to call attention to the situation. After the statements that have been made here about the need of having this additional help now, I would not delay it from those that have this opportunity to get it. Disclaiming any intention whatever at any time to coerce the Senator from Mississippi, for I would not make so grave a mistake as that, I will withdraw my motion to recommit.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to say this, Mr. President: It is true that there was no proposition before the Senate at the last session. The reason why that is true was because the majority caucus at that time did not instruct that such a proposition should be brought before the Senate, and passed no resolution to do for the minority what the majority caucus of this session has passed for the minority of this session.

Mr. LODGE. Before the Senator takes his seat I should like to ask him a question, if I may. The last proviso recites "that if any of the committees recited above already have three employees, the resolution shall not apply to them." That means that those committees of the minority which now have three employees, including a messenger at $1,440, are not to be disturbed?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator is right, and I will state the reason. I procured the assistance of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who, as we all know, is great at details in matters of this sort; I procured the assistance of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], the assistance of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], and the assistance of the Secretary of the Senate, and the Secretary's office to get a full list of such of the committees as had only two employees. But I was afraid that even with all that there might be some error. I am just informed by the Senator from Massachusetts that in the case of his committee there is an error. It is so difficult to get these things right that I put in the resolution this proviso:

Provided, That if any of the committees recited above already have three employees, the resolution shall not apply to them.

So this resolution does not touch them in any way; it leaves them in statu quo.

Mr. LODGE. That means three employees whether by law or by detail.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no; not detail, if they have one by detail, and most of these committees have. Over half these committees have messengers by detail.

Mr. LODGE. Only seven have messengers by detail, I think.

Mr. OVERMAN. Ten.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Ten.

Mr. LODGE. Those 10 are all to be reduced to $1,200?

Mr. WILLIAMS. To $1,200.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I did not hear all of the colloquy between the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from Massachusetts; but to give a concrete case, I have two clerks and also a messenger, who is delegated by the Sergeant at Arms.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This resolution applies to you, then. It applies to every case where the messenger is detailed.

Mr. McCUMBER. It would apply practically, then, to all the cases, because all of them are detailed clerks. I now move to amend by striking out "$1,200" and inserting in lieu thereof "$1,400," and I ask for a roll call on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. I did not hear the Senator's motion.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope that the amendment will be voted down and that the action of the committee will be sustained.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas (to Mr. WILLIAMS). Move to lay it on the table.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will move, I believe, to lay the amendment to the amendment on the table.

Mr. McCUMBER. On that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand that as to the 10 committees on this side of the Chamber that have details the salaries are cut down to $1,200 under the resolution as reported by the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. All of them from $1,440, whether majority or minority committees. They are placed on an equal footing at $1,200.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand, then, there are 10 committees on this side of the Chamber that have detailed messengers at $1,440 and 3 on the other side. There may be more than that number. There are also messengers detailed by the Sergeant at Arms at $1,440. This resolution cuts all down, I understand, to $1,200.

Mr. WILLIAMS. To $1,200, making no distinction.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. No; the Senator is entirely mistaken about that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There are 21 names in the resolution.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I understand that there are about 60 committees of the Senate.

Mr. OVERMAN. That being so, I move to reconsider the vote——

Mr. LODGE. A motion has been made to lay the amendment to the amendment on the table, and I make the point of order that it is not debatable.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not debatable. The Senator from North Dakota calls for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] to the amendment of the committee.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRADLEY (when his name was called). On account of my pair with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN], I refrain from voting.

Mr. CLAPP (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. In his absence, I withhold my vote. I desire this statement to stand in the absence of that Senator.

Mr. JACKSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON]. I inquire whether he has voted or not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not voted.

Mr. JACKSON. As he has not voted, I will withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]. As he is absent, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. THOMAS. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] to the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and vote. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 34, nays 35, as follows:

So the Senate refused to lay Mr. McCUMBER's amendment to the amendment on the table.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

STOCK GAMBLING.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, during the morning hour I gave notice that after the morning business I would address the Senate on the subject of the bill I introduced. I trust the Senator from Arkansas will withhold the motion.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I withdraw the motion for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER].

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I only withdraw the motion for the purpose of giving the Senator from Arizona an opportunity to submit his remarks. He may present his remarks now just as well as at any other time. It is not necessary to have the bill before the Senate. Unless he is prepared to go on at this time, I shall renew the motion.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I introduced a bill this morning relating to a subject that has long impressed me——

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota will state his point of order.

Mr. McCUMBER. The point of order is that an amendment was offered and the yeas and nays were asked for upon it, and during the time when the yeas and nays were requested the Senator from Mississippi moved to lay the amendment upon the table. The yeas and nays were called upon that motion, and it was lost. It seems to me that now the amendment is still before the Senate undisposed of, with a demand for the yeas and nays on the amendment pending.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That does not interfere with debate, unless there has been some change in the rule with which I am not familiar. Does the Senator make the point of order that I can not move to go into executive session at this stage of the consideration of the pending resolution? I should like to know what we are to have in response to that.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; if the Senator from Arizona is speaking upon this question——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. He is not required to say what he is speaking on.

Mr. McCUMBER. I can not object to his right to speak on this proposition.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Senator can not object to his right to speak on any proposition.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator from Arizona indicated that he desired to address the Senate upon an entirely different subject; this is the subject before the Senate now, and it has not been removed from the consideration of the Senate; and until it is laid aside in some way no other question can be interjected. If the Senator from Arizona is to speak on this question in any way, then, of course, my point of order is not well taken,

Mr. ASHURST. I do not intend, directly or indirectly, to speak upon the subject of the report of the committee submitted by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], but I purpose speaking upon the bill which I introduced this morning. I will state very frankly that I do not fully understand the precise effect and purport of the committee report submitted by the distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], and of course I do not care to speak upon a subject which I do not fully understand. I therefore will speak upon a subject which I do understand; that is to say, the bill which I introduced. It is my view of the rules, however, that having given the notice which I did this morning that I would address the Senate on the subject of the bill which I introduced, it is now in order for me to proceed. If not in order at this time, I shall cheerfully withhold my remarks until a later hour in the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The ruling of the Chair is that the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota is before the Senate, and that the Senator from Arizona can talk on any subject he pleases unless he has announced that he does not propose to speak to the pending question, in which event——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I wish to suggest that the ruling of the Chair is entirely correct except the limitation. The Senator from Arizona is not required to notify anybody and is not responsible to anybody for what he chooses to talk about. He has a right to debate this question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas will understand that the reason for the statement by the Chair was the distinct disavowal on the part of the Senator from Arizona that he would speak to the question before the Senate.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That distinct disavowal is a part of his right. No one has a right to censor his remarks or confine him to any particular text. This is the only tribunal on earth where there is unlimited debate, and there is no question of relevancy here except what is designated in the rules, and this is not one of them. I think he is entitled to proceed to address the Senate and to choose his own words in which to address the Senate. He probably will be able to say something that will have some relevancy, although he is not even required to do that. This is a more important question than the trifling matter about these salaries. If there is any power that can put a limitation upon the right of a Senator to debate questions according to his own judgment, then we are for the first time entering upon a cloture rule that had better be considered in its entirety before it becomes one of the rules of the Senate.

I think the Senator from Arizona is entitled to proceed according to his own judgment. That is in accordance with the precedents of the Senate and not in violation of any rule of the Senate that anyone can direct our attention to. If he can, I pause to afford him an opportunity to do so.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] is correct in saying that, under the customs of this body, a Senator can talk on any subject at any time, provided he has the strength to do so; but I rise more particularly to correct the statement made by the Senator from Arkansas, who is usually very accurate and who evidently is paying a good deal of attention to the study of the rules of the Senate, when he says this is the only body on the face of the earth that has unlimited debate. As I understand the matter, the House of Lords has unlimited debate, the Parliament of Canada has unlimited debate, the State Senate of New Hampshire has unlimited debate, and I can imagine there are other legislative bodies similarly situated. So that I correct the Senator for the purpose of showing that we do not stand alone in that respect, whether it is for good or for bad.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I shall not controvert what the Senator says at this time, because it is not material and I do not care to waste the time on it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I wish to say one word with respect to the ruling which I understood the Chair to make. I think that ruling can be sustained upon reason and in accordance with the precedents of the Senate. No Senator has ever yet declared during the 15 years I have been here that he proposed to take up and discuss a subject other than the one pending and that he would not discuss the pending subject. If that can be done, then any Senator, at any time, of his own volition, can bring up a bill and proceed to discuss it at length, even though another motion is pending.

I admit, Mr. President, that neither the Chair nor the Senate can call to order a Senator because his remarks are not directed toward the subject that is before the Senate; but I do not think our rules have ever been construed to mean that when a Senator disclaims any intention of discussing the subject before the Senate, but, on the contrary, proceeds to state "I shall call up another proposition that I referred to this morning and discuss that," that he is within the rules of the Senate, he himself admitting that he is not within the rules and does not intend to be within the rule that requires a subject to be disposed of either by vote or a motion to lay it aside, or by a motion to go into executive session or to adjourn, which takes precedence. So I think the Chair was eminently correct in his ruling.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, the remarks of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] are all right, but his deductions are not justified by the actual case with which we are dealing. He says it is not within the competency of a Senator to call up for consideration an entirely distinct question and to proceed to discuss it. I do not understand it is the purpose of the Senator from Arizona to call up anything. There is quite a distinction between displacing a proposition pending before the Senate and submitting remarks that are not relevant. If that rule were applied, it would depopulate the Senate and absolutely doom some of us to eternal silence, if we had to talk sense and talk directly to the questions that are pending. We have not progressed to that point yet. I maintain that the Senator from Arizona is entitled to proceed, if he sees proper to do so; and if he does not see proper to do so, then I propose to make a motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I have not the slightest desire to proceed unless I am strictly in order. If I be out of order I will wait until just before the moment of adjournment, and then deliver the brief remarks I desire to make.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Senator is in order if he wishes to proceed.

Mr. ASHURST. If I be in order, I want to say this——

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator, with his permission, if he intends to address himself to the subject under consideration before the Senate?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, my remarks will be as far removed from the subject under consideration as were some of the speeches respecting it this afternoon. I do not intend or expect to touch in the remotest way the subject that was under consideration when I obtained the floor. So far as that subject is concerned, my remarks will go out upon an unreturning parabola.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then, Mr. President, I insist that the Senator can not call up another resolution and speak to it while another motion is pending.

Mr. ASHURST. I will say, most respectfully, that I did not call up a resolution. I gave notice this morning that I would make some remarks, and they will be very brief.

Mr. President, proceeding, as I assume, in order, I desire to state that this morning I introduced a bill which I asked to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. To that request, I understand, objection was made. I have given the subject of that bill much consideration, because we all must be aware of the fact that the reprehensible and scandalous gambling transactions in some of the great cities of our Nation have had a tendency to increase the high cost of living to an enormous degree——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I ask for order.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the Senate is not in order.

Mr. ASHURST. I will say that I do not care whether any Senator listens or not. I am talking to the people, and before I shall have said my last word on this bill millions of people will be interested in the matter.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. ASHURST. I cheerfully yield to the Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. I simply want to say that there are some of us, at least there is one on this side, who wishes to hear the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. I know that. I thank the Senator. In the course of my investigations regarding reprehensible transactions upon the stock market, I had occasion to read a magazine published, I believe, in New York City, to wit, Everybody's Magazine, which contained a rough draft of a bill prepared, as I understood, by a citizen of Massachusetts, to wit, Mr. Thomas W. Lawson, a gentleman whom I do not know and from whom I have never received a letter or any other communication. In support of the draft of his bill prohibiting gambling was a short argument. I asked this morning to be permitted to include my bill and that short and temperate statement in the RECORD. Objection was made by a Senator whom I regard as one of my dear friends, the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON]. I should at this time state that no Senator here has a higher appreciation of that great Senator than have I. He has for over 18 years been an honored and distinguished Member of this body and an eminent leader in the great Democratic Party, to which I have the honor to belong; and it is with much reluctance that I differ from him, and with some diffidence that I seek to incorporate into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the matter to which that Senator has objected.

Moreover, certain Senators here appear to harbor an impression that I do not have a punctilious regard for the rules of the Senate. Senators, that is a mistaken impression. It is true that, like most other Senators, when I first came here I doubted the advisability of many of the rules; but I am now prepared to say that I believe the rules of this body, taken as a whole and excluding some obvious inconsistencies in them, are a wise and efficacious collection of rules for the government of any parliamentary body of this character, and there is no Senator more desirous of observing the rules of the Senate and courtesies of life than am I, for when you break down one rule—one barrier—another will be broken down and then another. Try as we may, Mr. President, we can not escape these courtesies, these little amenities, which add beauty, zest, and grace to life, and when we violate and break down one rule, soon we will break down another. That is the reason I am so anxious to proceed only in order.

Senators have suggested that I should not attempt to make these remarks this afternoon. Cicero, in one of his epistles, said:

> Nobody can give you wiser advice than yourself; you will never err if you listen to your own suggestions.

While I welcome advice from all sources, I have found that I make few errors when I follow my own suggestions. Therefore I now ask unanimous consent that the bill introduced by me this morning be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request that the bill be printed in the RECORD? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The bill (S. 1311) for the regulation of the use of the mail by stock exchanges and their members, and to amend certain sections of the Criminal Code of the Compiled Statutes of the United States, relating to lotteries, and for other purposes, was ordered to be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

> A bill for the regulation of the use of the mail by stock exchanges and their members, and to amend certain sections of the Criminal Code of the Compiled Statutes of the United States, relating to lotteries, and for other purposes.
> Be it enacted, etc., That Title LXIX a, chapter 8, section 213, of the Criminal Code of the Compiled Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby amended to read as follows:
> "SEC. 213. No letter, package, postal card, or circular concerning any lottery, gift enterprise, or similar scheme offering prizes dependent in whole or in part upon lot or chance, or concerning any stock exchange where securities or stocks, bonds, notes, or other evidences of indebtedness, or evidence of part or proportionate ownership of property, are dealt in on a margin or on credit; and no lottery ticket or part thereof, or paper, certificate, or instrument purporting to be or to represent a ticket, chance, share, or interest in or dependent upon the event of a lottery, gift enterprise, or similar scheme offering prizes dependent in whole or in part upon lot or chance, and no letter, statement, account, bill of particular, or other information regarding any purchase or sale upon or in any stock exchange of any securities, stock, bond, or other evidence of indebtedness, or of part or proportionate ownership of property on a margin or on credit; and no check, draft, bill, money, postal note, or money order, for the purchase of any ticket or part thereof, or of any share or chance in any such lottery, gift enterprise, or scheme, or for or on account of any purchase or sale upon or in any stock exchange, on a margin or on credit, of securities, stock, bond, note, or other evidence of indebtedness, or evidence of part or proportionate ownership of property; and no newspaper, circular, pamphlet, or publication of any kind containing any advertisement of any lottery, gift enterprise, or scheme of any kind offering prizes dependent in whole or in part upon lot or chance, or containing any list of the prizes drawn or awarded by means of any such lottery, gift enterprise, or scheme, whether said list contains any part or all of such prizes, or containing any prices at which any stocks, bonds, notes, or other securities, or other evidences of indebtedness or evidence of part or proportionate ownership of property, shall have been brought or sold upon or in any stock exchange on a margin or on credit, shall be deposited in or carried by the mails of the United States or be delivered by any postmaster or letter carrier. Whoever shall knowingly deposit or cause to be deposited, or shall knowingly send or cause to be sent, anything to be conveyed or delivered by mail in violation of the provisions of this section, or shall knowingly deliver or cause to be delivered by mail anything herein forbidden to be carried by mail, shall be fined not more than $1,000, or imprisoned not more than two years, or both; and for any subsequent offense shall be imprisoned not more than five years. Any person violating any provision of this section may be tried and punished either in the district in which the unlawful matter or publication was mailed or to which it was carried by mail for delivery according to the direction thereon, or in which it was caused to be delivered by mail to the person to whom it was addressed."
> SEC. 2. The foregoing section, in so far as it expressly relates to stock exchanges and the business there carried on, shall not apply to any stock exchange which is organized under the laws of the State where its principal place of business is located: Provided, That such stock exchange is organized with a charter and by-laws which comply with all of the provisions of this act: And provided, That such stock exchange and its members comply with all of the provisions of this act and further comply with the provisions of the charter and by-laws required by this act.
> SEC. 3. The charter or the by-laws of such stock exchange shall provide that the members thereof and all persons doing any business upon the exchange, or the officers of such stock exchange, or both, shall keep a full, accurate, and complete record of all business done upon the exchange; that the same shall be kept in proper books of account; that the Postmaster General of the United States shall have authority and power to direct the manner in which such books, records, and accounts shall be kept; and that all the books, records, and accounts of such exchange and of every member thereof, and of every person who does any business upon the exchange, shall be at all times open to the inspection of the Postmaster General and any and every post-office inspector specially designated for the purpose by the Postmaster General, not, however, exceeding at any one time three in number in any one city or town. Said charter or by-laws shall further provide that any member or other person doing business upon the exchange who shall refuse or neglect to comply with the foregoing requirements, or who shall willfully destroy any such records or any paper demanded by the Postmaster General, or by such inspector specially designated as aforesaid, shall be expelled from the exchange.
> SEC. 4. The by-laws of such exchange shall further provide—
> (a) That no one excepting a member, or, as the by-laws may provide, a designated agent or designated employee of a member, shall be allowed to do or conduct any business upon the exchange.
> (b) That no member or other person upon the exchange shall directly or indirectly sell or offer for sale or pretend to sell any property or security and at the same time either directly or indirectly purchase or pretend to purchase the same property or security at the same price.
> (c) That no member or other person doing business upon the exchange shall accept or execute or attempt to execute an order from any customer or other person for the purchase or sale of any security, knowing or having reason to believe that he or any other member or person authorized to do business on the exchange has, either directly or indirectly, from the same customer, an order to purchase the security which he is ordered to sell, or to sell the security which he is ordered to purchase.

(d) That no member or other person authorized to do business upon the exchange shall sell, or attempt to sell, or pretend to sell, or pretend that he has sold any security, nor buy, or attempt to buy, or pretend to buy, or pretend that he has bought any security, with the purpose or intent of recording a quotation or price.

(e) That the word "security" as used herein shall include shares in any corporation, joint-stock company, or association, bonds, coupons, script, rights, choses in action, and any and all other evidences of debt or property and options for the purchase or sale thereof.

(f) That the following transactions upon the exchange or between members of the exchange are prohibited, viz:

1. Washed or fictitious sales.

2. Margin sales where there is no intent actually to purchase or deliver the securities. If settlements are made without the completion of the purchase or sale of the securities and the actual delivery thereof, this shall be prima facie evidence that this clause has been violated.

3. The taking or carrying of a speculative account, even though the securities are actually delivered, if the customer is an employee of a bank, trust company, or insurance company, unless such bank, trust company, or insurance company consents in writing to the transaction.

SEC. 5. No member of such exchange shall be by such exchange or its officers hindered or prevented from trading freely in or on any other exchange which has been organized and is conducted in accordance with this act, and which has the right to use the mails hereunder, nor shall any such exchange forbid any member from executing orders because such orders are received from a member of any other such exchange.

SEC. 6. No such exchange shall require that any certificates of stock, bonds, evidence of property, or other security dealt in on such exchange shall be printed, lithographed, or engraved, by or at the place of business of any designated firm, person, or corporation; but such exchange may require that all such certificates of stock, bonds, or evidence of property or other security shall be printed or lithographed or engraved, according to any designated standard of workmanship, quality, or excellence.

SEC. 7. The charter or the by-laws of such exchange shall further provide that any member or person authorized to do business upon the exchange who shall violate any of the provisions of the by-laws required by this act, or any of the provisions of this act, shall be expelled from the exchange. The by-laws of such exchange may provide for a method of hearing and determining whether such member or person authorized to do business upon such exchange has violated any section or clause of this act or of the charter or by-laws of the exchange, and shall further provide that a member expelled for such cause can not be reinstated for at least five years from the date of such expulsion.

SEC. 8. Whenever it shall appear to the Postmaster General, or any inspector designated by the Postmaster General, that any section or clause of this act or of the charter or by-laws provided for in this act has been violated, he or some agent or employee of the Post Office Department shall in writing call the same to the attention of some officer of the exchange wherein such alleged violation occurred. Thereupon, unless it appears to the satisfaction of the Postmaster General, or such agent as he may designate, that the said exchange has promptly and properly heard and determined the said alleged violation and has expelled the person who has so violated this act or the charter or by-laws of said exchange, then the Postmaster General shall in writing notify said exchange that at the expiration of 10 days from the receipt of such notice such exchange and its members shall cease to have the privilege of using the mails.

SEC. 9. The Postmaster General of the United States shall have authority and power to direct the manner in which the books, records, and accounts of stock exchanges and of the members thereof using the mails shall be kept; and he and such post-office inspectors as he may specially designate for such purpose, not exceeding three at any one time, shall have authority and power to inspect and make copies of the books, records, and accounts, or any part thereof, of any such exchange and of any member thereof.

SEC. 10. A copy of such book, record, or account, or any part thereof, made pursuant to section 9 hereof shall constitute competent evidence of the contents of any such book, record, or account, or part thereof, in any proceeding instituted by or before the Postmaster General; and in any proceeding, civil or criminal, under this act, when such stock exchange or member thereof fails to produce said books, records, or accounts upon due notice, or where said books, records, or accounts have been lost or destroyed.

SEC. 11. The completion of a purchase or sale of any security or pretended purchase or sale of any security, when said purchase or pretended purchase or said sale or pretended sale is not accompanied by an actual delivery of the said security shall constitute prima facie evidence that there was no actual intent to deliver the said security, and that the purchase or sale was fictitious.

SEC. 12. No person shall be excused from attending and testifying or producing any books, papers, or other documents before the Postmaster General or any post-office inspector or before any court, magistrate, or grand jury upon any investigation, proceeding, or trial for a violation of any of the provisions of this act upon the ground or for the reason that the testimony or evidence, documentary or otherwise, required of him may tend to convict him of a crime or to subject him to a penalty or forfeiture; but no person shall be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter or thing concerning which he may so testify or produce evidence, documentary or otherwise, and no testimony so given or produced shall be received against him upon any criminal investigation or proceeding.

SEC. 13. Any such exchange or officer or member thereof shall have the right by bill of equity filed in the United States district court in the district in which such exchange is located to apply for an injunction to enjoin the Postmaster General and any and every postmaster and agent and employee of the Post Office Department from interfering with the use of the mail by such stock exchange and its members. Said court is hereby given authority and power to issue a restraining order or injunction, as it may deem just, if it shall appear to the court that this act has not been violated and that the charter and by-laws of said exchange provided for in this act have not been violated. Unless such injunction or restraining order shall have been issued such exchange and all members thereof who have not resigned and withdrawn therefrom shall, at the expiration of said 10 days, cease to have the privilege of using the mails.

SEC. 14. This act shall take effect at the expiration of six months from the date of its passage.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I shall now read the following:

THE STOCK-GAMBLING KILLER.

If this law be put upon the statute books by the incoming Congress and President Wilson in 1913, this is what it will do by 1914:

Absolutely destroy stock gambling.

Start the drop in the annual interest return to invested capital.

Start the drop in the high cost of the American people's living without a corresponding drop in the wage of the American people.

Start an increase in the price of every honest, good American security.

Start a drop in the price of every dishonest, bad, American security.

Pull the teeth, cut the claws, and wither the fangs of the Money Trust.

Start the stock exchange toward the high position it should occupy in the Nation's business structure.

A study of this law will clearly show that no honest business can be injured by its enactment.

In its drafting I have had the best legal talent in the land. Its authors have bedrock plumbed their knowledge and their experience to fulfill my order, which was "to spare no time, money, or effort in the creation of a law to which no honest man or woman could object."

My instructions were:

Sacrifice nothing to the radical or the sensational, nothing to the interest of any individual or class. Confine its prohibitions to those evils which are not only recognized by all, but which the stock exchange itself emphatically prohibits but never prevents. Above all, make it so simple that all can understand.

This law fills the bill plus, and once on the statute books it will prove the system's gallows. It is the only way in which these present evils can be constitutionally destroyed.

Boiled down, this law means:

That no stock exchange can exist without the use of the mails.

That no stock exchange will be allowed to use the mails unless it organizes and does business under the charter and by-laws set forth in this law.

That the constitution and by-laws set forth in this law are such that if the stock exchange and its members live up to them many of the present evils which have brought high-cost living will become impossible.

That if they are not lived up to, the Postmaster General will give notice that the exchange in 10 days will be put out of business—barred from the mails—and that every member of the exchange who in the meantime does not resign and cease doing business on the exchange will be barred from the mails.

As the Post Office works to-day, the Postmaster General's power is absolute; there is no appeal from it to the courts or to any one or thing; but only because Congress under its authority conferred by the Constitution has not provided any. In this law Congress provides for an appeal to the court.

Therefore the exchange and its members are not subject to the will of the Postmaster General or to any other official of the Post Office Department. If, when they receive the Postmaster General's notice barring them from the mails, they feel that they have not infringed, they will have the right to ask the United States court of the district to enjoin the Postmaster General, whereupon the facts of the infringement of the law will be tried in open court.

To those who raise the question of constitutionality, I say:

The Constitution gives Congress absolute right to bar anyone from the use of the mails on the ground of public policy.

All the courts have said that Congress, not the courts, has the say so as to what is against public policy, and that once Congress has decided what is against public policy no court or other power can interfere.

All the courts have decreed that the use of the mails is the right of no citizen, that it is merely the privilege of any citizen, and that no citizen whose use of the mails Congress has decided is against public policy will be allowed to exercise this privilege.

When Congress passes this law it will have said in effect that it is against public policy for the stock exchange to do business as the stock exchange has been doing it.

And Congress protects the stock exchange and all its members by saying: "If you are unjustly accused of breaking your pledge not to cheat, you have but to go to the nearest court and get redress."

The final boiling down of this law is: That once this law is on the statute books, no member of the big exchanges will take any chance of losing his business and incurring the disgrace of being pounced upon by the Post Office Department, and consequently stock gambling will be killed.

This law, once it is on the statute books, will be the last word on stock gambling, just as the Louisiana lottery law was the last word on lotteries, for it will read:

Congress has decided that it is against public policy for any stock exchange to cheat. Therefore, bar every cheating stock exchange and its members from the mails.

Mr. President, what I have just read I have not written or prepared. It is simply the clipping and excerpt which I tried to get into the RECORD this morning. Every word of what I have read was written by Mr. Lawson. Therefore, having accomplished my purpose and having included into the RECORD that excerpt which I attempted this morning to put into the RECORD, I have done what seems to me to be my duty.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 36 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 53 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Thursday, April 24, 1913, at 2 o'clock p. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 21, 1913.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou great Father-soul, above all, through all, in us all, we bless Thee for all the disclosures Thou hast made of Thyself in the works of Thy hands which environ us—the stars which shine by night, the sun which fills the earth with glory day by day, the change of seasons, the wonderful adaptation of means to ends everywhere apparent. But above all do we thank Thee for that strange, mysterious something which we call conscience—the still, small voice speaking through the soul words of encouragement when we are in harmony with the laws which Thou hast ordained, chiding us when we strike a discordant note. Make more sensitive our spiritual ears, that we may hear more clearly Thy voice, and give us the courage to obey. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, April 17, 1913, was read and approved.

SWEARING IN OF MEMBERS.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa and Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas appeared before the bar of the House and took the oath of office.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER. Last Thursday the President sent a message in, and after the message came in certain gentlemen got into a prolonged parliamentary wrangle, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] moved to adjourn, and the Chair forgot all about the message and now presents it to the House. Luckily there is nothing in it that demands immediate action.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

On August 21, 1912, and October 19, 1912, there were appointed by the President, in accordance with the authority granted to him to reorganize the customs service, Winfield T. Denison, Esq., an Assistant Attorney General; William Loeb, jr., Esq., collector of customs at New York; and Felix Frankfurter, Esq., law officer of the Bureau of Insular Affairs, as a committee to inquire into the procedure, practice, and administrative methods of the Board of United States General Appraisers.

I transmit herewith the report of this committee on these subjects.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 15, 1913.

The SPEAKER. The message and accompanying document are ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent Mr. HENRY was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of James Tandy, first session, Fifty-ninth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

ASSAULT ON REPRESENTATIVE SIMS.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 59.

Whereas it has been published in various newspapers circulating in the city of Washington, D. C., and elsewhere, and otherwise currently reported, that on Friday, April 18, 1913, THETUS W. SIMS, a Representative in Congress from the State of Tennessee, was, in a public park in said city, while on his way from his place of residence to a department of the Government for the purpose of transacting official business, and while in attendance upon the Congress as such Representative, set upon and physically assaulted by one C. C. Glover, a citizen of the District of Columbia; and

Whereas said assault is alleged to have been made because of words spoken by said Representative on the floor of the House while it was in regular session; and

Whereas said assault, if made, constitutes a breach of the privileges of the House and of its Members and demands immediate action on the part of the House for the protection of its rights and the rights of its Members in the performance of official duties: Therefore be it

Resolved, That a select committee of five members be appointed forthwith by the Speaker of the House to investigate and report:

First, whether such assault was made by said C. C. Glover upon the said Representative, THETUS W. SIMS; and if so, then,

Second, a course of procedure to be followed in dealing with the said C. C. Glover, to the end that the rights and the privileges of the House of Representatives and its Members shall be maintained and protected.

For the purpose of ascertaining the fact herein required to be reported upon, the said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, and to examine witnesses upon oath administered by the chairman or any member thereof.

Said committee shall report not later than Saturday, April 26, 1913.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I take it that every Member of this body is familiar in a general way with the episode which occurred on Friday last between a Member of this body and a citizen of the District of Columbia, it having been widely published in the local papers and in all papers, substantially, throughout the country. It therefore does not seem necessary for me to enter now into any review of that episode, and it seems to me that all the facts that are essential to action upon the part of this House are contained in the resolution as it has been offered and read from the desk. That it presents a question of highest privilege, I take it, is a matter which can scarcely be gainsaid. I think I should say this: That this matter is not presented at the request of the Member who is alleged to have been assailed, nor is it presented by me simply because of the fact that I happen to be from the same State as the Member who is alleged to have been assailed, but it is presented as a matter of House privilege, in the belief that this House owes it to itself to protect its own rights and the rights of its Members in the performance of their official duty.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MURDOCK. I am in entire sympathy with the purpose of the gentleman. I know the services of Mr. SIMS. He has been one of the men here who has been fearless in handling local affairs, and when I read the episode it was my hope that when his friends moved in this House they would follow the precedent and have immediate action upon the proposition; that is, that they would follow the old precedent where the offender was brought before the bar of the House and reprimanded by the Speaker.

Now, I would like to ask the gentleman why he brings in a proposition for a committee to investigate? Why is it not better in a case of this kind, where the dignity of the House has been affronted, for the House to act with dispatch?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, in the cases to which the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] refers—I take it he refers to the case of Samuel Houston and to the Wood case, in 1870, and there are some other cases in which the House has taken cognizance of physical assaults upon its Members—in those cases the Member who was assaulted himself brought the question to the attention of the House in a letter addressed to the Speaker, and upon that letter as a basis the House proceeded to take summary action.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] has not brought the matter to the attention of the House by a letter to the Speaker or otherwise, and there are those of us who feel that he ought not to be asked, or that it ought not to be suggested, that he bring it to the attention of the House; and, consequently, after a conference among some of those interested in this proposition, it was determined that this was the most dignified method of procedure. The committee which is provided for is simply to first find a fact, and, if it finds that fact, to report a method of procedure.

Mr. MURDOCK. Well, my point was this: There is no dispute between the two gentlemen as to the episode. It occurred. Now, what is the purpose of the appointment of the committee? What will the committee find out other than the things we already know.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The matter has not been brought to the official attention of the House by any statement other than such as is contained in this resolution, embodying a mere allegation. It is my opinion, as a legal proposition, that if it had been brought to the attention of the House in the manner and form that the other cases to which the gentleman has referred were brought to the attention of the House, the House could have taken action; but not being brought in that way, it seems to me, as a legal proposition, that it is necessary that there be some official determination of the fact that the assault did occur.

Mr. POU and Mr. COOPER rose.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield first to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU].

Mr. POU. The gentleman has just stated what I was going to suggest—that up to this time the House officially knows nothing.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. I understand it to be admitted that there is no reason why, because of the physical condition of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], alleged to have been assailed, he himself could not have brought this to the attention of the House. He has been, and is, physically able to bring it to the attention of the House. Is that true?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Why, of course, that is true.

Mr. COOPER. Does the gentleman know of any case where the House of Representatives heretofore has ever seen fit to order an investigation of this kind upon mere newspaper report, when in the same newspapers the Member of the House alleged to have been assaulted is reported as saying that he does not wish to do anything further about the matter? There is nothing before the House of an official character. There is nothing—no complaint—to show here that an assault was committed. It is putting the House of Representatives, is it not, in the attitude of proceeding upon mere newspaper report?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the resolution which I am presenting is based upon newspaper report and current rumor otherwise circulating.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. One moment. But upon my responsibility as a Member, and believing it to be a question far beyond any personal feeling that might be entertained by my colleague from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], being a matter that touches the privileges of the House and all its Members, I have assumed the responsibility of bringing it before the House.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER. The resolution is not related to the responsibility of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] himself at all?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Except in so far as I offer it.

Mr. COOPER. It is based entirely upon what the gentleman admitted a moment ago, namely, mere newspaper report and public rumor; but the public rumor is based upon the newspaper report.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. COOPER. Now, Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit me an interruption further? Does not the gentleman know that sometimes mere newspaper rumors are wholly unreliable; that they have been contradicted repeatedly as absolute misstatements upon this floor? Ought we to proceed at this time solely upon newspaper rumor when the gentleman who is alleged to have been assaulted is able, physically, to bring the matter to the attention of the House?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the House, when it comes to final action upon this proposition, will not be proceeding upon mere newspaper reports. It will be proceeding upon a solemn report made by a committee appointed under the terms of this resolution, if it shall pass; and so far as the suggestion of the gentleman from Wisconsin is concerned, that it ought not to be brought to the attention of the House by any Member of the House unless it be the Member who was himself assaulted, I submit that that is overlooking the rights of all the other Members of the House, and is making what it is not desired to make this case—a personal matter with the Member assailed.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will yield for a question.

Mr. COOPER. I did not wish to be put in the position into which the gentleman now seeks to put me. I asked if the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] were physically able to make this complaint. If it were true that he had been assaulted so severely that he could not write a letter or otherwise make complaint and bring the matter to the attention of the House, then some other person could properly do so either by direct statement or upon information and belief. There is no reason whatever why the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] can not make complaint. But in the same newspaper report upon which the gentleman [Mr. GARRETT] relies it is related that his colleague [Mr. SIMS] said that he did not wish to proceed with the matter. Therefore why should the House, on mere newspaper report, go into a proceeding of this kind?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Well, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Wisconsin seems to be making up his mind on the strength of a newspaper report that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] said he did not wish to proceed in the matter.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, there can be no question, I think, so far as the fact is concerned, that the statement made by the resolution as to an assault upon a Member of the House is entitled to an investigation. The resolution which has been presented was submitted to me, along with other Members of the House, before it was presented. I stated to the gentleman in charge of the matter that I could see no objection to the passage of the resolution.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit one interruption?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that since the resolution was submitted to him there have been added in the first paragraph, after the words "transacting official business," as the gentleman will see down there, the words "and while in attendance upon the Congress as such Representative" I did not have an opportunity to submit that to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman was under no obligation to me, of course, in the matter.

There is one matter in the resolution, however, which, upon further examination, I desire to call to the attention of the House. The resolution recites that Mr. SIMS was assaulted by Mr. Glover; that the assault is alleged to have been made because of words spoken in the House in debate; and then it recites that—

Whereas said assault, if made, constitutes a breach of the privileges of the House and of its Members,

Then the resolution provides for the appointment of a committee to ascertain the facts and, if the facts are as alleged, to report a course of procedure.

I am quite in accord with the resolution, with the understanding, however, that I am not prepared at this time to express a definite opinion as to whether an assault upon a Member of the House outside of the House constitutes a breach of the privileges of the House. That may be a question which ought to be examined into by the committee when appointed, and I think will be examined into by the committee when appointed; and I think that the committee when appointed will not assume that the resolution adopted by the House carries with it a determination by the House that the House sustains this "whereas" without further examination into the precedents and into the constitutional privileges of the House.

My present feeling is that I would like to see it clearly established that an assault upon a Member of the House for his official work constitutes a breach of the privileges of the House. But I am not prepared yet to say whether under the precedents, the law, and the Constitution that be the case. I hope that the committee, if appointed, will make examination into the question as to whether an assault upon a Member of the House outside of the House, either for words spoken in this Congress or a prior Congress, or for other official business, constitutes an assault upon the privileges of the House and its Members, and that it will make a report upon which the House can act intelligently.

I do not believe this is a matter that is personal with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS]. If the privileges of the House have been invaded, it is the duty of the House to protect itself and its Members if it has the constitutional right to do so. If under the law the privileges of the House have not been invaded, there is nothing more that we can do except so to determine.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am in entire accord with what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has just said, and I should not speak at all but for the fact that I desire to add just one suggestion.

If this resolution shall carry, I hope that the committee to be appointed will consider not simply the question whether the power of the House goes to the extent of authorizing action on and punishment for an assault upon a Member for words spoken in the House or for actions as a Member, but whether it may not also be very much wider than that, and rest upon the right of the House to protect itself and its membership by punishing an assault without regard to whether the assault be related to any official act of a Member or words spoken by him in his official capacity, and I join with the gentleman from Illinois in the hope that the committee may make such a report as will give to the House a clear view of its powers in matters of this kind, that it may know and the public may know the responsibilities that rest upon us and upon the public touching membership in the National House of Representatives.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Tennessee yield two or three minutes to me?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, this is a matter of the very gravest importance, not only to the House of Representatives but to the citizens of the country. The assumption of the authority on the part of the House to punish a citizen for an assault on a Member out of the presence of the House is an assumption of doubtful authority.

Since the publication of the matters referred to in this resolution, I have taken occasion to go through the precedents and decisions. No doubt the committee appointed will go into the question of the authority of the House to punish, as for a contempt of the whole House, an assault upon one of its Members outside of the presence of the House.

The resolution takes the most dignified form that the House could possibly take at this time in connection with the matter in question.

Under the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Kilbourn v. Thompson (103 U. S., 168) the House has no authority to punish a citizen for the assault alleged to have been committed in this case.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I do.

Mr. HARDWICK. In the case to which you refer the power of the House was denied solely because the House was seeking to prosecute an inquiry that the court held was entirely beyond its jurisdiction, was it not?

Mr. CAMPBELL. No.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think the gentleman will find that was the case.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The whole question of the right of the House to punish for contempt was gone into by Mr. Justice Miller in that case. The report in Hinds' Precedents is a synopsis and not the full report of the case.

Mr. HARDWICK. But the decision rested on just what I have stated, did it not?

Mr. CAMPBELL. No; and the court went into the question of the right of Congress to punish for contempt and decided that it has no such right, and the court also went so far in the Kilbourn case as to review and disagree with and reverse the rule in the case of Anderson against Dunn, in which the right was sustained. I hope there will be a full discussion of this question when the proposed committee reports.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I have myself some very well-defined ideas about the legal powers of the House in matters of this kind, but I do not care to express them now. In fact, it has seemed to me that in view of the form in which the resolution is drawn it is not proper to express those ideas at this particular time. The question of power will arise in due time. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed the following committee: Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia, Mr. RUCKER, Mr. CRISP, Mr. PROUTY, and Mr. NELSON.

The SPEAKER, being informed that Mr. RUCKER was out of the city and would not return for a week, substituted the name of Mr. COVINGTON for that of Mr. RUCKER.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States, was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

THE OPIUM EVIL (H. DOC. NO. 33).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, ordered printed, and, with accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In transmitting the accompanying report from the Secretary of State I most strongly urge not only the immediate appropriation of the sum of $20,000 which is asked, the absolute necessity for which is so apparent, but also the enactment of the requisite antidrug legislation to which this Government is pledged internationally.

It is a source of gratification to me personally, and it will always be, I am confident, a subject of gratification to the Nation, that this Government, realizing the extent of the opium and allied evils, should have initiated the world-wide movement toward their abolition. At this vital period of the movement to fail to take the few final steps necessary definitively and successfully to conclude the work would be unthinkable, and I therefore trust that there may be no delay in the enactment of the desired legislation, and the consequent mitigation if not suppression of the vice which has caused such world-wide misery and degradation.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 21, 1913.

The PRESIDENT:

Since the early days of our relations with China and other oriental countries it has been a constant policy of this Government to aid such countries in their efforts to prevent the development of an opium evil within their borders, or to assist them toward the eradication of such an evil where it already existed. In conformity with this established policy, and as early as 1833, in the various treaties negotiated with China, Japan, and Siam, American citizens were absolutely forbidden either directly or indirectly to engage in the opium trade, or were permitted to engage in that trade only in conformity with the laws of those countries.

In the autumn of 1906, when this Government learned that China had set on foot earnest efforts to crush out the opium evil within her boundaries, it initiated an international movement which aimed to secure on behalf of the Chinese effort the cooperation of those western powers having territorial possessions in the Far East and who were concerned therefore in the economic, diplomatic, and other controversies arising from the Far Eastern opium traffic. The international movement inaugurated by this Government was not only fully justified by the fact that it had since its earliest contact with the Orient forbidden American citizens to engage in the opium trade, but because it was found necessary to protect the population of the Philippine Islands against the effects of that traffic. In furtherance of its purpose this Government in September, 1906, entered upon a correspondence with the Governments of Great Britain, France, Germany, Japan, the Netherlands, and China to ascertain if the time had not arrived for the interested Governments to determine if the entire Far Eastern opium traffic could not be brought to an end. The above-mentioned Governments willingly offered to cooperate with the United States, and agreed to a joint investigation of the question. Thereupon six other nations, namely, Russia, Austria-Hungary, Italy, Portugal, Persia, and Siam, particularly interested in the Orient, were also invited to join in the investigation, and in February, 1909, there met at Shanghai, China, the International Opium Commission. That commission thoroughly examined the opium question in all its bearings, and arrived at nine unanimous conclusions which, in substance, condemned the evils associated with the production and use of opium and morphine, and contained recommendations as to the measures to be taken to bring such abuses to an end.

But the International Opium Commission was not empowered to negotiate a convention binding the participating powers. It was a commission for the purpose of study, consideration, and recommendation. To obtain a more positive result, a further step was necessary—an international convention to be agreed upon in conference by delegates of the interested Governments, such a convention to provide not only international rules under which opium should be produced and the traffic therein conducted, but also the general rules by which opium should be confined to strictly medicinal purposes in the territories of the different countries. Accordingly, in the autumn of 1909, this Government issued a proposal to those Governments which had been represented in the international commission that there should be a conference composed of delegates with full powers to meet at The Hague or elsewhere to conventionalize the conclusions arrived at by the International Opium Commission and the essential corollaries derived therefrom. The proposal contained a tentative program which proved to be generally acceptable.

The Netherlands Government very promptly and courteously requested that the conference meet at The Hague, and on December 1, 1911, on invitation of the Queen of the Netherlands, a conference of the powers represented in the Shanghai commission assembled there, and the delegates thereto were authorized by their Governments to formulate and sign an international convention. In the correspondence between the United States and the several Governments which led to the assembling of the conference the necessity for the consideration not only of the opium evil, but also of the morphine, cocaine, and Indian hemp drug evil was developed, and it was agreed by the interested Governments that those questions were to be included in the program of work, and by convention were to be placed under the same limitations as opium.

On the 23d of January, 1912, the delegates to The Hague conference signed a convention composed of strict stipulations as to the production and the international and national traffic in opium, morphine, and cocaine, and—an important point—it confirmed to China all that had been agreed upon between that country and Great Britain by virtue of their agreement of May 8, 1911. (See S. Doc. No. 733, 62d Cong., 2d sess.)

That the questions dealt with by the Shanghai commission were not only humanitarian and moral, but also questions of great economic importance, had been partly realized and was steadily developed during the sittings of The Hague conference. Since it was found that they affected not only the revenue and economic interests of the 12 powers with oriental relations whose representatives had assembled at The Hague, but also the major part of the other nations of the world, the conference came to the conclusion that to make its convention effective it was necessary to secure adherence thereto by the other nations of the world. Therefore the convention was so drafted that it was not to become effective until 34 other nations named in article 22 of the convention should add their signatures to the instrument by means of a protocol of supplementary signatures to be opened at The Hague.

The necessary supplementary signatures to the convention were to be secured by December 31, last, the Netherlands Government and the United States cooperating to that end. In the event of failure to secure all 34 signatures the Netherlands Government engaged immediately to call a final conference of all signatory powers, that conference to determine upon the deposit of ratifications of the convention. Up to the 31st of last December, the two Governments had secured the signatures, or been assured of the signatures, of all of the Latin-American States except one; while but three of the European States had declined to sign. Since a few of the necessary 34 signatures have not been subscribed to the convention, a second and final conference has now become necessary, and the Queen of the Netherlands has therefore invited all the signatory Governments to send delegates with full powers to The Hague in June next to agree upon the deposit of ratifications of the convention which it is to be hoped will definitively bring to an end the deplorable and ruinous abuses connected with the production and traffic in opium, morphine, and cocaine.

This, Mr. President, is a movement which I have closely followed for the past six years. I have examined all the essential facts and documents relating thereto, and have been gratified to review the growth of this humanitarian, moral, and economic movement from a consultation between this Government and five or six of the great powers of the world to one which now embraces the cooperation and has the sanction of almost the entire group of civilized States, and this in spite of the fact that it means past and future financial losses to the powers concerned of over $50,000,000 aggregate annual revenue. The entire movement illustrates a principle abroad in and stamped with the approval of the world to-day, namely, that the peoples are now agreed that an evil such as the opium evil is never wholly national in its incidence, can never be suppressed by two nations alone, as was supposed to be the case with the Far Eastern opium traffic, but that such an evil as it appears in one State is a concomitant or reflex of a similar evil in other States, and therefore is international in its moral, humanitarian, economic, and diplomatic effect; further that few evils can be eradicated by national action alone, and therefore that there must be cooperation of all the States directly or indirectly interested before such an evil is mitigated or suppressed. This movement, in which the United States has taken so large a part, was thought at first to concern only those countries of the Far East or those western nations having territorial possessions in the Far East—five or six in number. But it has proceeded by way of a sober international commission of inquiry composed of commissioners representing 13 nations, and by a conference composed of delegates with full powers representing 12 of these nations. Those delegates having formulated and signed on behalf of their Governments a convention containing strict pledges for national legislation and international cooperation, it was presented to the remaining States of Europe and America—34 in number—for their signature, and so far only 3 of the 34 have hesitated.

I have seen in the Orient and elsewhere the havoc wrought by the abuse of opium, and I feel a pride that our Government has been in the forefront of a progressive movement which by the cooperation of the other nations of the world has been carried to the point where but a final step is necessary effectually to put an end to the misuse of drugs which while of inestimable benefit to humanity when properly used are such a curse when abused.

That this international movement for the suppression of the opium traffic has been of incalculable benefit to China and has been one of the chief factors in her modern rehabilitation can not be denied, and there can be no doubt that the civilized world has rallied to the support of that country in her opium crusade, because of the fact that that crusade is not spasmodic and a matter of authority, but genuine, and of and by the will of the Chinese people.

The economic burden imposed upon China by the abuse of opium was well-nigh unbearable. It has been stated on the highest authority that up to the time the opium reform movement began the Chinese people expended over $150,000,000 a year on the consumption of foreign and native opium; that the value of the land given over to the production of native opium, were it planted with wheat or other more useful crops, would yield to the Chinese people an annual return in the neighborhood of $100,000,000; that the average earning capacity of the millions who were addicted to the habit of opium smoking was reduced one quarter, resulting in an annual loss in productive power of nearly $300,000,000, or a total annual loss to China of about $550,000,000. In this calculation no account is taken of the capital loss involved.

It would be easy for me to point out that the release of China from her opium evil will redound to the credit of all nations concerned and leave a vast number of her people free to spend their energies in the development of internal and foreign commerce to an extent that our commercial bodies have long realized, to the material benefit of China and of those nations who have so loyally assisted her in her great internal movement for reform, and should soon enable the Chinese people to stand as economically free as any other people in the world.

I regret, however, that there is one feature of the international and national effort for the suppression of the opium evil that should be disquieting to the Government and people of the United States. It has been stated that a reflex effect of the initiation by the United States of the international movement for the abatement of the opium evil took the form of improved domestic legislation in nearly all countries concerned, and of very drastic legislation in some. Yet, despite this, this Government since February, 1909—the time of the passage of the Federal opium exclusion act—has taken no further definitive action for Federal control of the opium and allied traffics in the United States. The passage of the opium exclusion act was the first step which the Congress took to put our own house in order. There were three bills introduced in the last Congress which aim to supplement and perfect that act. I understand they are to be introduced in the early days of the present session, and will be pressed to enactment, thus placing this Government in a rightful position before the world; this is greatly to be desired.

The necessity for our representation at the forthcoming conference at The Hague is so apparent that I need not enlarge upon it, and I therefore have the honor to recommend that the Congress be asked immediately to appropriate the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to enable this Government to meet expenses incidental to and in continuity of its efforts to stamp out the opium evil through the forthcoming final conference at The Hague, and otherwise to make effective the results heretofore accomplished; this sum to be expended at the discretion of the Secretary of State and to continue available until the object appropriated for is accomplished.

Since the forthcoming conference will meet in the coming June, and the necessary and extensive preparations must be made for it by this Government, it is very important that the appropriation be made immediately available.

Respectfully submitted.

W. J. BRYAN.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR CERTAIN EXPENSES OF FIRST SESSION OF SIXTY-THIRD CONGRESS.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill H. R. 2973.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 2973. Making appropriations for certain expenses incident to the first session of the Sixty-third Congress, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums are appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, namely:

UNDER LEGISLATIVE.

The appropriations for mileage of Senators, Members of the House of Representatives, and Delegates from the Territories, and expenses of Resident Commissioners, made in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1914, approved March 4, 1913, be, and the same are hereby, made immediately available and authorized to be paid to Senators, Members of the House of Representatives, Delegates from the Territories, and Resident Commissioners, for attendance on the first session of the Sixty-third Congress.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

For stationery for Members and Delegates and Resident Commissioners, at $125 each, for the first session of the Sixty-third Congress, $55,000.

For the following employees during the first session of the Sixty-third Congress, but not longer than until and including June 30, 1913, namely:

For 46 pages, including 2 riding pages, 4 telephone pages, 1 press gallery page, and 10 pages for duty at the entrances to the Hall of the House, at $2.50 per day each; 3 telephone operators, at the rate of $75 per month each; in all, $10,535, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR.

For the following in the Department of Labor, pursuant to the act of March 4, 1913, creating a Department of Labor, from March 4, 1913, or from the date of their appointment and qualification, respectively, until the end of the fiscal year 1914, namely:

The Secretary of Labor, at the rate of $12,000 per annum; Assistant Secretary of Labor, at the rate of $5,000 per annum; Solicitor of the Department of Justice for the Department of Labor, at the rate of $5,000 per annum; chief clerk, at the rate of $3,000 per annum; disbursing clerk, at the rate of $3,000 per annum; private secretary to the Secretary, at the rate of $2,500 per annum; confidential clerk to the Secretary, at the rate of $1,800 per annum; and private secretary to the Assistant Secretary, at the rate of $2,100 per annum; in all, $42,300, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

All appropriations made for the fiscal year 1914 and balances, after March 4, 1913, of appropriations made for the fiscal year 1913, together with all appropriations made or to be made in the sundry civil appropriation act for the fiscal year 1914, for the bureaus, offices, or other divisions of whatever designation or character, transferred from the Department of Commerce and Labor to the Department of Labor under the act approved March 4, 1913, shall be available for expenditure in and by the Department of Labor, and shall be treated the same as though said branches of the public service had been directly named in the laws making said appropriations as parts of the Department of Labor, under the direction of the Secretary of the department: Provided, That as to all general appropriations for printing and binding, and contingent or miscellaneous expenses, the amounts that shall be transferred hereunder, except where the same are specifically fixed by law, shall in the case of each bureau, office, or other division be not less than the average amount expended on account of or allotted for expenditure to each of the same during the fiscal years 1912 and 1913.

The Secretary of Commerce is authorized and directed, as soon as may be practicable, to transfer to the Department of Labor all chiefs of division, assistant chiefs of division, clerks, messengers, assistant messengers, watchmen, charwomen, laborers, or others now employed in the divisions of his office who were, up to March 4, 1913, wholly engaged upon the work relating to the business of the bureaus and offices of the Department of Commerce and Labor transferred to the Department of Labor under the act of March 4, 1913; and in proportion to the number of persons in the divisions of his office whose time and labor were partially devoted to the work of said bureaus and offices he shall transfer approximately an equivalent number of clerks and other employees to said Department of Labor, and the appropriations made for the compensation of all persons transferred hereunder shall be credited to and disbursed by the Department of Labor.

The Secretary of Labor shall submit to Congress, for the fiscal year 1915, and annually thereafter, estimates in detail for all personal services and for all general and miscellaneous expenses for the Department of Labor.

THE PANAMA CANAL.

SEC. 2. That during the fiscal year 1914 all moneys received by the Isthmian Canal Commission or the governor of the Panama Canal from any services rendered or materials and supplies furnished employees, the Panama Railroad Co., the Canal Zone government, the Panama Government, and other departments of the United States Government, from hotel and hospital supplies and services; from rentals, wharfage, etc.; from labor, materials, and supplies and other services furnished vessels and to those unable to obtain similar labor, materials, supplies, and services elsewhere, shall be credited to the appropriation from which payments for the materials, supplies, labor, or other services were originally made; except that moneys received from the sale of material and equipment purchased and used for construction purposes, and as a reimbursement for the expenditures incurred in constructing waterworks, sewers, and pavements in the cities of Panama and Colon, including interest on such expenditures, excluding payments on account of the expenses for maintenance of such waterworks, sewers, and pavements incurred under agreement with the Panama Government, and otherwise herein disposed of, shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts; and except that after the canal is opened for use and operation the net profits accruing from the operations herein authorized shall annually be covered into the Treasury of the United States, as provided for the profits accruing from the business authorized in section six of the Panama Canal act.

That until the close of the fiscal year 1914, when any material, supplies, and equipment heretofore or hereafter purchased or acquired for the construction of the Panama Canal is no longer needed, or is no longer serviceable, it may be sold in such manner as the President may direct, and without advertising in such classes of cases as may be authorized by him.

RENTAL OF BUILDINGS.

SEC. 3. Hereafter the statement of buildings rented within the District of Columbia for use of the Government, required by the act of July 16, 1892 (27 Stat. L., 199), shall indicate as to each building rented the area thereof in square feet of available floor space for Government uses, the rate paid per square foot for such floor space, the assessed valuation of each building, and what proportion, if any, of the rental paid includes heat, light, elevator, or other service.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Illinois are each entitled to 20 minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, this bill makes the appropriation for mileage for the regular session of the Sixty-third Congress available for this session. It provides the money necessary to supply Members with stationery, in accordance with law; it provides for certain session employees in the nature of pages for the House. It also provides for the situation arising from the creation of a Department of Labor in the closing days of the last Congress. In the closing hours of the last Congress a bill was passed creating the Department of Labor. To that department were transferred from the Department of Commerce and Labor certain bureaus, but no provision was made for the compensation of the new Secretary and his Assistant and of certain other employees, nor was there time to make arrangements for the transfer of the appropriations made for the Department of Commerce and Labor to the new Department of Labor. A provision in this bill provides for compensation for certain places created in the act, and imposes upon the Secretary of Commerce the duty of transferring employees to the Department of Labor who properly should be there, and provides for the transfer of appropriations in order that the appropriations may be expended by the new department.

The bill also contains a provision relative to the Panama Canal. The paragraph was contained in the sundry civil bill as it was prepared by the Committee on Appropriations at the last session of Congress. It was known as section 3, but due to some misunderstanding arising in the closing hours of the session the provision was stricken from the bill on a point of order. Unless the provision makes available certain receipts in accordance with what has been done in the past, it will require appropriations aggregating $1,000,000 in addition to those heretofore made.

There is one other provision, which is of an administrative character, which requires that in the statement of the buildings rented in the District of Columbia for the use of the Government to be made each year there shall be inserted information which will indicate the area of the rented space, the price per square foot of floor space paid for the rented property, and the assessed value of the property. It is believed that this information, with the other information now required by the statute, will be of great value to Congress.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I wanted to ask the gentleman from New York, in reference to section 2 of the bill, whether he knows how much money is now held by the Panama Railroad Co. which it is proposed to turn into the Treasury?

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is none held; but under the law at present certain receipts are utilized in the construction of the canal. Under the Panama Canal act, as soon as the commission is abolished and a permanent organization effected, these receipts will no longer be available toward the construction, but certain receipts are utilized and the net profits turned in as miscellaneous receipts. The purpose of this provision is to continue available the same funds toward construction after the Panama Canal act is put into effect until the construction work is completed.

Mr. FOSTER. So that there is no money held now by the Panama Railroad Commission which has not been turned into the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. FITZGERALD. This does not affect the Panama Railroad money at all.

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from New York yield for a moment?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] that this provision simply carries into immediate effect the scheme of legislation that was devised for the control of those same funds in the permanent government of the zone. In the last sundry civil appropriation bill it went out on a point of order, and after careful examination and an understanding of its temporary character the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce became convinced that the Appropriations Committee was dealing properly and wisely with the temporary situation.

Mr. FOSTER. I understand that all the receipts from the commissary department and from the railroad company are now going into the construction fund of the Panama Canal. Is that right?

Mr. COVINGTON. Oh, no.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There are certain supplies furnished by the commission, and the proceeds of the sale of certain materials are credited to the construction fund. The funds of the Panama Railroad Co. are separate and distinct, and are held separate and distinct.

Mr. FOSTER. That is what I wanted to know. What becomes of this fund now held under this provision of the bill?

Mr. SHERLEY. Which fund?

Mr. FOSTER. The funds of the Panama Railroad Co. and of the commissary department of the railroad company.

Mr. SHERLEY. The Panama Railroad Co. funds are not affected by this provision at all. All this provision contemplates is that the moneys that are received by the canal commission for services performed, whether for the railroad company or otherwise, instead of being covered into the Treasury may be used as a part of the construction fund to continue the work.

Mr. FOSTER. Has the railroad company now any fund on hand?

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, yes; the railroad company has a great many funds.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Nearly $2,000,000.

Mr. FOSTER. What is it proposed to do with that fund?

Mr. SHERLEY. This does not affect that at all.

Mr. FOSTER. It does not affect it in any way?

Mr. SHERLEY. No.

Mr. COVINGTON. The net result would be it would have to be reappropriated, and it would show, as a matter of fact, that the same fund has been appropriated.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield first to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], who desires to ask a question.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I want to clear up in my own mind a doubt about the accounting system of the House itself. We appropriate money for mileage and stationery in this bill?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not for mileage. We make available for this session of Congress the appropriation already made.

Mr. MURDOCK. The larger proportion of the committees of the House are not yet appointed, but each committee, as a matter of fact, is working to some extent and has a clerk. When do we make the appropriation in the beginning of the Congress for the pay of the clerks of the committees?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is carried in the legislative bill.

Mr. MURDOCK. When is that available?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The legislative bill for the fiscal year 1913 carries the appropriation out of which they are being paid at the present time, and the legislative bill for the fiscal year 1914, passed at the last session, continues their payment from the 1st of July next, the beginning of the fiscal year.

Mr. MURDOCK. Then, as the system operates, really before a committee is appointed there is a clerk to that committee.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certain clerks are on the annual roll and they are paid regardless of whether the committee be announced. They attend to bills and different matters that come into the committee. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. Ten minutes.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I see in this bill that the private secretary to the Secretary of Labor receives a salary of $2,500. I would like to inquire if this is the same salary received by other private secretaries to members of the Cabinet?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is the same compensation as is paid to private secretaries of all members of the Cabinet. I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York reserves the rest of his time.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do.

Mr. MONDELL. I notice on page 5, lines 10 and 11, section 2, the words "and other departments of the United States Government" are used. I assume this section is intended to refer exclusively to the canal and the Canal Zone. Was that the intention?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is the intention; yes.

Mr. MONDELL. It seems to me those words without any qualification might be held to apply to sums received for those purposes through other departments of the Government.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is true. For example, if a naval vessel went to the Isthmus and the Panama Canal Commission rendered some services and paid for them out of the appropriations made for the Canal Zone, it wishes the money given to it as a reimbursement to be available for the purpose of work on the Canal Zone. The same conditions should exist if the services were rendered to any other department.

Mr. MONDELL. But only on the Canal Zone.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, yes; on the zone. It is really a bookkeeping matter. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL].

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to publish in the RECORD the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Kilbourn against Thompson, touching the question of the power of the House to punish for contempt.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the Supreme Court decision in the case of Kilbourn against Thompson.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, that is a very long case, and in my opinion the House should not print this case in the RECORD for the gentleman from Kansas, who has already expressed an opinion upon the questions involved in anticipation of the report of the committee which has been appointed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I shall object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have no objection to printing it as a document, so it may be available for Members.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I think it important that Members of the House should read this case.

Mr. SHERLEY. I suggest to the gentleman that he print a reference to the case in his speech if he wants to, and everybody knows how to find a decision of the Supreme Court and how to read a law report.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes; but it is a little difficult to find a sufficient number of the report.

The SPEAKER. It is objected to, and that is the end of it.

Mr. MANN. I now yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

The SPEAKER. How much time?

Mr. MANN. As long as he desires.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to have printed as a document an article printed in the American Economic Review of last March, entitled "The Tariff Board and wool legislation," by William S. Culberson, who was connected with the Tariff Board. I will say this article makes an analysis in a nonpartisan way of all the various tariffs relating to the wool schedule that were introduced in the last Congress, and I am sure it will prove very valuable to every Member upon both sides of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to print as a document an article on the subject of wool by W. S. Culberson.

Mr. SHERLEY. Would the gentleman object to having printed as a part of the document an article by Mr. Page, formerly a member of the Tariff Board, on the woolen schedule, to be found in the North American Review for the current month?

Mr. LENROOT. Not at all.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] amends the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] by asking that a certain article written by a Mr. Page, and printed in the current number of the North American Review, on the same subject, also be printed as a public document. Is there objection?

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand they are to be printed together in the same document?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; as a document.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let the light go with the darkness.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know the extent of these publications. About how many pages are there?

Mr. SHERLEY. This particular one is about 10 or 15 pages in the North American Review, I think.

Mr. FINLEY. Now, as to the other——

Mr. LENROOT. About 20 pages of it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman who made the request a question. I have read one of the articles and appreciate its value; and I wanted to ask the gentleman that if unanimous consent is granted and this is printed as a document, how the Members receive it—through the folding room or document room?

Mr. LENROOT. Through the document room, as the request stands.

Mr. MURDOCK. How many are they entitled to as Members?

Mr. LENROOT. I think it is 2,500.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They remain to the credit of the Members in the document room.

Mr. MURDOCK. I would like to ask the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY] how many are printed?

Mr. FINLEY I think in the neighborhood of 1,500 or 2,000, or something like that. I do not know the exact number.

Mr. MANN. The usual number is 1,540, of which the House receives a little over 400 copies.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is it not true that there can be a reprint if that number is not sufficient?

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not yield any further.

Mr. EDWARDS. I would like to ask——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] objects.

Mr. MANN. I do not object to the request for printing.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request?

Mr. EDWARDS. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] how these documents are to be distributed?

Mr. LENROOT. The application will be by the Members to the document room, and they will receive them.

Mr. EDWARDS. They are not to be distributed through the folding room?

Mr. FINLEY. No.

Mr. COOPER. Did I understand the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to say that the House, under the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], will have only 400 copies?

Mr. MANN. I think a little less than that.

Mr. COOPER. That is not one apiece.

Mr. MANN. The House has it in its power to fix the number desired. The usual number is limited.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield this time one minute to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS].

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD certain letters from two distinguished Democrats—first, letters from Thomas Jefferson——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I object to printing in the RECORD anything until we get rid of this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] objects.

Mr. WILLIS. He objects to the printing of the letters of Thomas Jefferson?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects.

Mr. LANGLEY. The gentleman from Ohio has time in which to state what he wanted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] objects. It does not make any difference what his reason is.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, it is somewhat remarkable that the gentleman on the other side of the aisle who will be chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the House, one of the greatest committees in existence in any legislative body on earth, a leading Democrat, should at the beginning of a Democratic administration object to printing in the RECORD a letter written by Thomas Jefferson, the father putative of Democracy. [Applause on the Republican side.] But we have drifted so far away from any of the doctrines of the early fathers that now the gentlemen are afraid to have printed for the generation of to-day letters written by Thomas Jefferson then and letters written by William R. Hearst now. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT]?

Mr. MANN. For a question?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; but does not the gentleman think that it is Democratic sacrilege to associate Thomas Jefferson with William R. Hearst? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I notice that there is some applause on the Democratic side on that. But there are mighty few Members on that side of the aisle who are willing to be known and have their names published as applauding. [Applause on the Republican side.] You gentlemen over there are not afraid now of Thomas Jefferson, because he is dead. [Laughter on the Republican side.] But you are afraid of William R. Hearst, because he is alive. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

No doubt, some day, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], who objected the other day and to-day to the request to print Mr. Hearst's letter, will obtain a reconciliation with Mr. Hearst. But it will not be a real reconciliation; it will be a Clark-Bryan reconciliation. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

And, Mr. Speaker, I may say that this side of the House, and I believe the other side of the House, not only sympathize with the Speaker in the contest that has been going on, but he, the Speaker, has our profound respect [applause on the Republican side], and we are not afraid to say so, because we are not seeking to influence the Secretary of State in the selection of men to fill jobs. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Is it because the gentleman thinks it is a hopeless job? [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. No; it is not because we think it is a hopeless job. We think we are not deserving. You think it is not a hopeless job, but it is, just the same, with you. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. RAGSDALE. I will say to the gentleman that it is not hopeless.

Mr. MANN. When the distinguished gentleman has been here a little longer he will have learned how hopeless it is. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. MANN. I do.

Mr. HARDY. Why does not the gentleman devote his attention to harmonizing the Bull Moosers with his party instead of harping about Bryan?

Mr. LAFFERTY. That is what the gentleman is doing.

Mr. MANN. It would be useless to waste an answer upon the gentleman from Texas. He could not appreciate what has been said. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. HARDY. If the gentleman will permit just one suggestion, I object to that last part, because it puts me in the same class with the gentleman himself, who could not appreciate my question. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Then I object also, because I object to being put in the same class with the gentleman. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. Speaker, what is the proposition before the House? To suspend the rules and pass an appropriation bill. Why suspend the rules? The other day the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], before the bill was introduced, asked to have it immediately considered, when no Member of the House had an opportunity to examine it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman himself said he had read it.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I did not say I had read it. I said I had received a copy of it ten or fifteen minutes before, but I did not have time to read it. The gentleman from New York may have read it before he introduced it [laughter on the Republican side], but he asked to have it passed without consideration, and now he asks to have it passed under suspension of the rules, where there can be no amendment offered to it. Why? In a few moments the House will have brought before it a rule for the consideration of two different appropriation bills, each of which will permit a motion to recommit, so that at least some questions can then be brought before the House.

What is there in this bill which the gentleman is afraid to have brought to the attention of the House? Is it the Panama Canal proposition? Is it the proposition to permit the President to sell, without advertising, the equipment on the Canal Zone? Or is it that proposition so dear to the hearts of many here—the subject of mileage? [Laughter.] For some years the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] has been seeking an opportunity to bring before this House a square vote on the subject of mileage.

Gentlemen on that side of the aisle have prevented that being done every time the question has been up in the last two years. Now the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] again finds himself in the situation where he must either vote against an appropriation for the maintenance of the Department of Labor or vote for a proposition for mileage which he considers unfair and unjust, with no opportunity to move to recommit the bill with instructions as to mileage. That is a very smooth thing. I admire the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] because he is a fine legislator and one of the smoothest articles that ever graced the floor of the House of Representatives. [Applause and laughter.] The gentleman from New York presents the proposition in such a way that he forecloses the right to amend, to recommit, to do anything with it except to vote for everything in the bill or vote against a proper appropriation for the maintenance of the Department of Labor.

The new Members on the Democratic side will find themselves being led by a rope in their noses, compelled to walk forward, compelled to do what they are told, with no opportunity to amend. You can not amend the tariff bill, you can not amend the sundry civil appropriation bill, you can not amend the Indian appropriation bill, you can not amend this little bill now before us. All you can do is to do what you are told by your bosses on that side of the House. On the stump you have been eloquent in declaiming against bossism and against Cannonism, but when you come here you lie down and let them walk over you, and you do exactly as they motion their fingers to you. [Laughter.]

How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has four minutes remaining.

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I feel very grateful to my friend on the other side of the aisle [Mr. MANN] for the few things he has said about me.

I have tried in my way to get some amendment before the House on the mileage proposition. In doing that I suppose I have in a measure brought down upon my shoulders a storm of indignation. I imagine that time and again I have been accused privately, if not publicly, of insincerity on this proposition.

Mr. BARTLETT. Did the gentleman ever have the assistance of the gentleman from Illinois in that effort?

Mr. COX. I never did. But I want to assure the Members of this House, if they need any assurance from me, that I have been sincere in this proposition. I am not quarreling at all about the manner in which the bills have come before the House heretofore, against which I have desired to offer my amendment. I would like very much at some time to get a square vote on this proposition.

Mr. MURDOCK. A record vote.

Mr. COX. A record vote, as suggested by the gentleman from Kansas. If ever we get a direct record vote on this proposition, I can not believe the membership of this House will refuse to reduce the mileage now paid to Members.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I can not yield. If the gentleman will give me more time, I will yield.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will yield the gentleman one minute, if he will allow me to make the statement that there was a record vote on this matter in the last Congress.

Mr. COX. I was not here at that time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman was absent because of illness in his family.

Mr. COX. That is true.

Mr. FITZGERALD. At that time there was a very strenuous controversy and a record vote on it.

Mr. BARTLETT. I know there was a record vote in the last Congress, and I know on several occasions I have voted with the gentleman from Indiana to reduce this mileage.

Mr. COX. I am glad to hear the gentleman make that announcement.

The Democratic Party—and I claim to be a member of it—have assailed the Republican Party on every stump, on every occasion when the opportunity presented itself to us, and we have condemned you Republicans for extravagance. The press of the country have condemned you. The first session that we were in control here it can truthfully be said to our credit that we made a record for economy. In the last session we can not boast of our record for economy. But I do not believe any Congress can make an efficient record for economy unless it is perfectly willing to begin at home. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman from New York yield to me two minutes?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will give the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. COX. It is of no use to talk to me of discussing with the people from whom you hold your commissions that it is necessary to have 20 cents a mile to carry us from our homes to the Capital and return again, because the people know that it is not true. We pay our ambassadors only 5 cents a mile. Why should we appropriate to ourselves 20 cents a mile and deny it to our ambassadors?

A MEMBER. Perhaps we have 5-cent ambassadors.

Mr. COX. It is suggested that we have 5-cent ambassadors. I doubt that very much, because I believe that we have been ably represented at foreign courts.

Now, I want to address myself particularly to the young Members of this House in this Congress, you who are fresh from the people. I saw you come into our caucus held last March, and I saw you drive a coach and four through some of the old rules that have been in vogue for 100 years, and I rejoiced to see you do it. I remember that when I came here I was told to go way back and sit down, as far as committee assignments were concerned. I saw you come here and violate and break those rules. I appeal to you, if the question ever comes where we can get a square vote on this question, when you are fresh from the people, that you stand for economy and that you will vote to repeal this law, or, if not to repeal it, at least to reduce it to 5 cents a mile. [Applause.]

I am not a crank on this question, but I am fighting to get this mileage reduced as it ought to be reduced.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has again expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I repeat at this time what I have said on many occasions, that I am as little interested in the mileage as any Member of the House. My mileage amounts to $92. This matter has been vigorously debated at times to my knowledge for 14 years, and every time the House has decided not to change the mileage. Under the law Members are entitled to mileage which is now fixed. This bill provides for that mileage. It was appropriated for the next session of Congress. This bill provides that the money heretofore appropriated shall be made available at this time.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is not complaining about this bill or of the manner in which it is brought before the House. He was on the other side in the mileage question from the gentleman from Indiana when the fight was made, and he gave as a reason for believing in the mileage as now fixed, an opinion which was widely published throughout the country, that we ought to appropriate sufficient mileage to enable the Members to bring their wives to Washington, because when their wives are here Members render more effective service. [Laughter.]

The truth of the matter is, the gentleman from Illinois believes that every item in this bill should be adopted; he has not suggested a single change that he would make in the bill if he was given an opportunity to offer an amendment. As a matter of fact he alone is responsible for the House considering the bill under conditions that do not admit of amendment. Last Thursday this bill was presented, and I asked unanimous consent to have it considered. Had consent been granted, every Member would have had an opportunity to offer amendments. But the gentleman from Illinois, fearing, perhaps, that somebody might attempt to interfere with and change this perfect measure, objected to that procedure and compelled me to move to suspend the rules, as that is the only way at present in which the House can get the bill before it.

The object of the gentleman from Illinois in his remarks this morning was not to antagonize the bill; it was an attempt, if possible, to cover up the widespread dissensions and divisions in his own party. [Laughter.] I objected to the publication of two letters in the RECORD, Mr. Speaker. For the first time in 14 years' service in this House I found some disposition on the part of my political opponents to read the writings of distinguished Democrats. I have ascertained that whenever permission is refused to embalm a publication in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, a curiosity is created in men to find out what is in the papers presented for publication. Like all human beings, they are curious as to anything to which objection is made for publication, and the two letters are now likely to be read by every Republican.

I know, from my knowledge of Republican Members in this House, that it will benefit them all greatly to read both of the letters.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] speaks of reconciliations. For the first time since the Populistic Party went out of power during my service here we have three so-called parties and several independent movements in this House.

Mr. HARDWICK. Personally conducted.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] heads the Democratic Party. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] hopes he is at the head of the Republican Party, though from what I have been reading about the dissensions in their caucus there may be some doubt about it. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], somewhat of a Republican, although advertised as a Progressive, has another organization of his own, and then some Members on that side of the House, unable to come in under any of these organizations, are acting as independent guerrillas in the House. [Laughter.] Why not try and reconcile Members on that side? Within a few days I have read a statement made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] recently assigned by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to the Committee on Ways and Means, in which he most vehemently denounces the proposed indorsement by the Republican caucus of a moribund tariff bill prepared by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE]. Reconciliations are in order over there, and how gratifying it would be to the gentleman from Illinois, and to everyone else who is opposing the organized Democracy, triumphant in this country, if there could be one great reconciliation. If the late President of the United States and his recent bosom friend who immediately preceded him in the White House could only be induced by some magic touch to come together and bury their personal differences in the interest of the G. O. P., how happy the gentleman from Illinois would be. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. And how unhappy the gentleman from New York would be. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. No, Mr. Speaker; for while that reconciliation is a futile hope, and while I should much prefer that my party should have the opportunity of beating them both together, since they will not give us that opportunity we will be content to beat them one at a time, all in the interest and for the welfare of the entire country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. All time has expired. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

MEMORIAL TO THOMAS JEFFERSON AT ST. LOUIS, MO.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass House joint resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution 62.

Resolved, etc., That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the following sum:

For defraying the expenses of the members of the committees of the Senate and House of Representatives, authorized to attend and represent the Senate and House at the unveiling and dedication of the memorial to Thomas Jefferson at St. Louis, Mo., on April 30, 1913, $7,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, of which sum $3,000 shall be accredited to the Senate, to be expended under the direction and by the order of the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate, and $4,000 accredited to the account of and expended under the direction and by the order of the Sergeant at Arms of the House of Representatives, upon vouchers to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate and by the Committee on Accounts of the House, respectively.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

Mr. FOSTER. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects; and the Chair appoints the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] to act as tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 141, noes 53.

So a second was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama is entitled to 20 minutes and the gentleman from Illinois to 20 minutes.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, it will be remembered by the Members who served in the Sixty-second Congress that a delegation to attend the unveiling and dedication of this monument to Thomas Jefferson was appointed by the Speaker of that Congress. The people of the States of the Louisiana purchase have donated some $450,000 for the purpose of erecting a monument to Thomas Jefferson.

That monument will be unveiled on the 30th day of April at St. Louis. The Senate very properly accepted the invitation to send a delegation representing the Senate on this important occasion, and named gentlemen to represent that body. The House accepted the same invitation, and the Speaker, in response to the authorization passed by this House, has named 12 gentlemen to represent the House on that occasion.

Mr. SMALL. How many Members compose the delegation of the Senate?

Mr. HEFLIN. Eight in the Senate, I believe. I regret, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, to find anybody opposing this resolution. I think it is the measliest economy that I have ever seen practiced by anybody. The idea of any Democrat in this House opposing a measure of this kind to have this House duly represented at that important occasion in honor of a man who formerly served in Congress, who was afterwards President of the United States, author of the Statutes of Religious Liberty in Virginia, the founder of the university, the author of the Declaration of Independence, and the founder of the great Democratic Party! It surprises me to hear these gentlemen opposing a measure of this kind. Now, these Members who have been appointed on this committee are not rich men; they are going to represent the dignity of this House on that occasion. It is an important occasion. No more important lesson can be taught to the youth of this country than to call to their attention what Thomas Jefferson stood for in the civic affairs of his land, and I am surprised to see gentlemen offering opposition at all to this measure. Now, gentlemen will note that the resolution says $7,000, so much to be used by the Senate, so much by the House, and so much of that fund, $7,000, as may be necessary to pay the expenses of these gentlemen, and I want to say that that is the only expense that will be paid—railroad fare, hotel fare. That is all. Do you not believe, gentlemen, that this House ought to defray those expenses? I think that the House ought to do that.

Mr. SMALL. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. HEFLIN. I will.

Mr. SMALL. If there are 20 on the committees of the two Houses, the sum of $7,000 will amount to $350 each. Does the gentleman think that is an excessive amount?

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not think it will take anything like that amount. I did not prepare the resolution. The amount named is too much.

Mr. SMALL. Why does the gentleman seek to appropriate an amount more than necessary for the purpose?

Mr. HEFLIN. The gentleman will note that the resolution says:

Or so much thereof as is necessary to defray the legitimate expenses of this committee.

Mr. SMALL. Did gentlemen of the committee investigate as to the amount which would be necessary for the expenses of this trip?

Mr. HEFLIN. I have not, but some gentlemen have; but I will say frankly——

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. HEFLIN. Just briefly.

Mr. COX. How many Members of the House are on this committee?

Mr. HEFLIN. Twelve.

Mr. COX. And how many of the Senate?

Mr. HEFLIN. Eight.

Mr. COX. Twenty in all?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield for a moment? I want to say that 2 members of that committee are not now Members of this Congress and are now home, 1 in St. Louis and 1 in East St. Louis, so there will be only 10 members of the committee.

Mr. HEFLIN. So there will be practically no expense for those two gentlemen; but, gentlemen, let me suggest to you—and I want those of you who oppose the resolution to reply to this—you have heard tell of straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, think of the remarkable economy some of you have practiced in this House. You vote for some big appropriation without murmuring, and on a matter like this, where it is a very small appropriation, gentlemen almost have fits when it is suggested. [Laughter and applause.] These delegations will have to account for their expenses. I am chairman of the committee appointed to go upon this trip. I shall account for every cent that I expend on that trip, and nothing but my legitimate expenses and of other gentleman of that committee will I ask at the hands of this House. As chairman of that delegation I will account to this House. I will see to that myself.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CLAYTON). Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. Briefly.

Mr. FOWLER. Does the gentleman from Alabama believe that Thomas Jefferson needs any monument erected by human hands to perpetuate his memory?

Mr. HEFLIN. Now, Mr. Speaker, in reply to that, I think Thomas Jefferson lives in the hearts of the people of the country. But from time immemorial it has been the custom of all civilized countries to erect monuments to perpetuate the memory of their distinguished dead. This country owes it to Thomas Jefferson to build a great monument to him, and the patriotic people of that section of the United States have done so. They will unveil it on the 30th day of April, and the only contribution that the Government of the United States will make toward that monument will be to bear the expenses of a delegation from the House and a delegation from the Senate. [Applause.]

I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MANN. I yield five minutes to my colleague from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER].

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I do not permit the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] to exceed me in admiration for Thomas Jefferson, the founder of the Democratic Party, and the man who did so much for the liberties of the people of this country and of the world. But I do suggest that when it comes to the appropriation of money for junketing trips I am opposed to it, as Thomas Jefferson, I believe, would be were he alive to-day. In the last Congress there was a resolution passed to provide for a committee to go to St. Louis to attend the unveiling of a statue of Thomas Jefferson. Upon that committee were appointed 12 Members of the House at that time. Two of those gentlemen have since ceased to be Members, and are private citizens. I have no doubt, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Alabama should go to St. Louis, that with all his eloquence he would be able to describe something of the wonderful tribute to this great man. But I submit that after it is all through and he comes back to Washington to assume his duties in this House, which he performs in a most distinguished manner, that he will not have added one iota to the greatness of Thomas Jefferson. And yet, according to his resolution, there is an authorization of $7,000 of the people's money to be spent upon this trip.

I submit to you, my friends, who have been upon trips at the expense of the Government, that you know what they are. It is useless for me to depict to you to-day any of those trips and how the money is usually spent. I do not believe, after we have spent $5,250,000 for the celebration of the great event with which Thomas Jefferson had something to do, that it is necessary now that we should spend $7,000 for the unveiling of this statue to that great man.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman recalls that the resolution appointing this committee was a simple House resolution, not even a concurrent resolution, and appointing the House committee, and did not that resolution and the committee appointed under it die with the Sixty-second Congress?

Mr. FOSTER. I think, Mr. Speaker, there is no question as to the fact stated by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

Mr. BARTLETT. And now we are to appropriate money for the expenses of a committee that died with the Sixty-second Congress.

Mr. FOSTER. That resolution which passed in the last Congress provided no appropriation. And I stated upon the floor at that time that they would probably be back here at the next Congress asking that an appropriation be made to defray the expenses of these gentlemen who are expected to attend this ceremony. But, Mr. Speaker, I submit to you that if the last Congress had intended that these expenses should be paid they should have provided an appropriation for that purpose, and not have waited until that resolution had died with that Congress, and then come back at this time and ask an appropriation of $7,000.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. I will.

Mr. HARDY. If the legitimate expenses of this committee only are to be paid, is it not difficult to figure out how each one could spend for car fare and sleeper and eating more than $100 apiece on that trip?

Mr. FOSTER. Well, I would think that probably true if the man was spending the money out of his own pocket, but when it comes to spending the money out of the Government's pocket there may be some difference.

Mr. HARDY. If each one spent $100, that would be $1,200. What is the necessity of making it $7,000?

Mr. FOSTER. This makes the amount about $330 each for this trip.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. GOULDEN. Is it not provided in the resolution that these bills should be audited by the proper committees?

Mr. FOSTER. It provides that they shall be audited. But let me say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULDEN] that they have a limit of $3,000, and did the gentleman ever know——

Mr. GOULDEN. Our Committee on Accounts, on which I served for six years, carefully audited all expenditures of this character, as was their duty.

Mr. FOSTER. I have no complaint to make of the Committee on Accounts or its chairman, but I suggest to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULDEN] when they present their bill within the limit of $3,000 the Committee on Accounts will allow it.

Mr. GOULDEN. I do not think they should. I agree with the gentleman from Illinois. I think the appropriation should have accompanied the resolution authorizing the appointment of a committee. I think it is wrong at this time to bring in a resolution of this kind, and especially for so large a sum.

Mr. FOSTER. I will say to the gentleman that if the appropriation had been presented with the resolution at the time it would probably not have passed, but I do not know. They come back now to a new House and ask you, because a former Congress had authorized this committee, to supply the money to pay the expenses of these gentlemen to attend the unveiling of the monument at St. Louis.

Mr. GOULDEN. I will say to the gentleman that I am duly thankful that I was not a Member of the last House, and that therefore I have nothing to answer for.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox].

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, no man in this House more highly respects and few men in the United States hold in greater reverence the name of Thomas Jefferson than I do. No man in this House has a greater respect for my friend from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] than I have. But I do not believe that it becomes him or any other Member of this House to undertake to forestall any man who might oppose this resolution by characterizing his action as being the meanest piece of parsimony that a man was ever guilty of if he should raise a protest against it.

I have voted for appropriations time and time again, but those were, in my judgment, necessary appropriations. I do not believe it can be shown by any Member of this House during my six years' experience on this floor that I have ever opposed an honest, meritorious appropriation which was needed to run the operations of this Government. But I oppose, and shall continue to oppose, even at the risk of being called parsimonious, the appropriation of public money to give a few men of this House and at the other end of the Capitol nothing in God Almighty's world but a junketing trip at public expense.

Why ask for $7,000 in this case? The average expense, or the legitimate expense incurred by one in traveling from here to St. Louis and return can, in my judgment, be paid with the small sum of $60.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. That will cover his train fare and his Pullman fare, and will cover his meals upon the train. Why ask $7,000? Four thousand dollars of it, I believe, is to go to the House, and $3,000 of it is to go to the Members of the Senate. The $4,000 is to be divided among 12 Members of the House. Why do that when $60 apiece will pay all the legitimate expenses between here and St. Louis plus what little expense may be required while in the city of St. Louis?

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman not know that——

Mr. COX. Let me tell the gentleman and others that there are other men and other people who should be consulted concerning this and other appropriations. They are the men and women back home who must by means of every drop of sweat that trickles down their brows pay these expenses. Will this proposed trip add one iota to the greatness of Thomas Jefferson? Echo answers back "No!" Thomas Jefferson, Alexander Hamilton, Abraham Lincoln, and other great men and patriots who have lived and died in this country have not yet reached the zenith of their fame or eminence in public estimation, and as long as civilization dwells on the face of the earth you can erect monuments in every city of the Union to commemorate the birth of Thomas Jefferson and other great men, yet it will not add one iota to his greatness. He will continue to grow in the opinion of patriotic Americans.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield to his colleague?

Mr. COX. For a question.

Mr. CLINE. If $60 is to be the amount of the legitimate expense of a man going and coming between Washington and St. Louis, including all the expenses incident to the trip, what is the balance to be used for?

Mr. COX. I do not know what the balance could be used for.

Mr. LANGLEY. The gentleman must know that champagne is expensive. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. I do not know anything about that, because I do not use champagne, although I may be no better on that account.

But I do sincerely appeal to the gentlemen on this side of the House to vote against this resolution when the vote is taken. We warned you in the last session, on the Monday night before the House adjourned, when we undertook to get from the gentleman in charge of the proposition a statement as to where the money was finally coming from. We put the question squarely up to him then, "Will you not be back here asking Congress to make an appropriation to pay these expenses?" At that time we were denounced as being penny-wise. I know there are men on this floor who do not look at these things very seriously. I know that in the district from which the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] hails they probably do not take very kindly to the arguments now made by myself and by my friend from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER]; but let me say to him and to those who sympathize with the arguments he makes that if he had to make a race for Congress in the North, as we do, where we have a Republican opponent facing us at every turn in the road and calling on us to account for these things, he would never denounce a Member on the floor of this House for being penny-wise in opposing these appropriations.

Gentlemen, we are starting in early. Let us see if we can not make a record for economy, especially in view of the fact that the President of the United States recently announced through the press of the country that economy would be one of the slogans of his administration. When men come to this House and ask for an appropriation of $7,000, and when every man who is able to figure the rudiments of arithmetic knows that $7,000 is not needed for this purpose, and it is confessedly unnecessary, let us vote against it.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Would the gentleman object to paying these members their actual expenses?

Mr. COX. I would most emphatically object to it.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. The gentleman would object to paying their actual expenses?

Mr. COX. I would object to paying their actual expenses. If any Member desires to get leave of this House to go out and attend the unveiling of this statue, I have no objection in the world, provided he wants to pay his own expenses; but I am unalterably opposed to this Congress appropriating one dollar or one penny for the expenses of anyone to go out there and attend that dedication. What good will it do? How does it propose to bring happiness or prosperity to the home of a single person in this land? The gentleman says it is a matter of great national importance that will call the attention of the youth of the country to the greatness of Thomas Jefferson. I deny it. There is no necessity to call their attention to the greatness of Thomas Jefferson, because his greatness stands and will continue to stand forever in the minds of the school children of this country, and not only of this country but of the world in general.

Now, Mr. Speaker, a word more to summarize this matter. Seven thousand dollars is the appropriation asked for here. What for? How is it going to be expended? I hope two-thirds will not vote to suspend the rules, and that the motion will be defeated.

Mr. MANN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS].

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, there may be some question as to whether it is desirable to have the Congress appropriate money to pay the expenses of a junketing trip. Personally, I do not think it is desirable or wise. Gentlemen on that side of the House appear to be divided in their councils upon that question, but I assume that there is no question as to the desirability and wisdom of erecting in the great city of St. Louis a monument to the memory of Thomas Jefferson. We upon this side honor the patriotic memory of Thomas Jefferson and we maintain the integrity of many of his teachings.

A few minutes ago I sought recognition for the purpose of placing in the RECORD some of the things that this great patriotic American said upon the questions now pending before the public, and of immense present interest. I had never supposed that we would live to see the day when gentlemen upon the Democratic side of the House were so ashamed of the policies they maintain that they would object to a publication of the letters of Thomas Jefferson relative to those subjects.

I say there is no doubt that it is desirable and wise and patriotic to erect a monument at St. Louis to the memory of this great American. But if there were any doubt about it, the fact that in substantially all of his public utterances he maintained and defended the doctrine of protection to American industries that fact alone would be sufficient to entitle him to high place. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Speaker, since objection was made to the printing of the sayings of this patriot and sage, I now propose to read some of them for the edification of Members on that side who are unfamiliar with the writing and policies of Thomas Jefferson touching the tariff question. [Applause on the Republican side.]

These are some of the things that Thomas Jefferson said at various times concerning a protective tariff:

"It is true we must expect some inconvenience in practice from the establishment of discriminating duties. But in this, as in so many other cases, we are left to choose between two evils. These inconveniences are nothing when weighed against the loss of wealth and loss of force which will follow our perseverance in the plan of indiscrimination. When once it shall be perceived that we are either in the system or in the habit of giving equal advantages to those who extinguish our commerce and navigation by duties and prohibitions as to those who treat both with liberality and justice, liberality and justice will be converted by all into duties and prohibitions. It is not to the moderation and justice of others we are to trust for fair and equal access to market with our productions or for our due share in the transportation of them, but to our means of independence and the firm will to use them. Nor do the inconveniences of discrimination merit consideration. * * * Perhaps not a commercial nation on earth is without them." (Foreign Commerce Report, vii, 650. Ford ed., vi, 483. Dec., 1793.)

"Should any nation, contrary to our wishes, suppose it may better find its advantage by continuing its system of prohibitions, duties, and regulations it behooves us to protect our citizens, their commerce and navigation by counter prohibitions, duties, and regulations also. Free commerce and navigation are not to be given in exchange for restrictions and vexations; nor are they likely to produce a relaxation of them." (Foreign Commerce Report, vii, 647. Ford ed., vi, 480. Dec., 1793.)

"The revenue on the consumption of foreign articles is paid cheerfully by those who can afford to add foreign luxuries to domestic comforts. Being collected on our seaboards and frontiers only and incorporated with the transactions of our mercantile citizens, it may be the pleasure and pride of an American to ask, What farmer, what mechanic, what laborer, ever sees a taxgatherer of the United States?" (Second inaugural address, viii, 41; Ford ed., viii, 343. 1805.)

"Between nations who favor our productions and navigation and those who do not favor them one distinction alone will suffice; one set of moderate duties for the first and a fixed advance on these as to some articles and prohibitions as to others for the last." (Foreign Commerce Report, vii, 650; Ford ed., vi, 482. Dec., 1793.)

"Where a nation imposes high duties on our productions or prohibits them altegether, it may be proper for us to do the same by theirs, first burdening or excluding those productions which they bring here in competition of our own of the same kind, selecting next such manufactures as we take from them in greatest quantity and which at the same time we could the soonest furnish to ourselves or obtain from other countries, imposing on them duties lighter at first, but heavier and heavier afterwards, as other channels of supply open. Such duties, having the effect of indirect encouragement to domestic manufactures of the same kind, may induce the manufacturer to come himself into these States, where cheaper subsistence, equal laws, and a vent of his wares, free of duty, may insure him the highest profits from his skill and industry." (Foreign Commerce Report, vii, 648; Ford ed., vi, 481. Dec., 1793.)

And so, Mr. Speaker, contrary to the present doctrine of the Democratic Party, it is clear that the patriot and sage who founded the party was in favor of a system of discriminative duties and was in favor of a protective tariff.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIS. Very briefly.

Mr. HARDY. Does not the gentleman know that Jefferson expressly said he preferred free seas, but was in favor of discriminating duties only with other nations who discriminated against us?

Mr. WILLIS. I am quite familiar with what Jefferson said.

Mr. HARDY. Is not that what he said?

Mr. WILLIS. As far as that is concerned, Mr. Speaker, the interruption of the gentleman is not apropos, because there is not a civilized nation on earth that does not discriminate against our products through tariffs, and that is exactly the situation that Jefferson was talking about.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, I decline to yield further just now, for I have not the time. I want to talk about Jefferson, and the doctrines of Jefferson are so far removed from present Democratic doctrines and practices that I hate to undertake to mix them in the same sentence. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that since our friends on the other side appear to be embarrassed, appear to be eager to object to the placing in the RECORD of any statements from this sage and philosopher, Thomas Jefferson, then, from time to time, some of us on this side of the aisle will undertake to elucidate matters and instruct those on the other side of the aisle as to what the real principles of Jeffersonian Democracy are. Only just the other day a very distinguished Democrat, known all over the country, said some very interesting things upon this subject. I read from a statement of Mr. William Randolph Hearst. In that statement he said:

"Jefferson, the founder of the Democratic Party, recognized the principle of protection and advocated discriminating duties in favor of American shipping and reciprocity treaties in favor of American trade."

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER].

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, it is to be regretted that at the present stage in this session of Congress we should bring the tariff into a discussion of this resolution. This is a very simple proposition and one which every gentleman recognizes and knows is necessary. The Louisiana purchase was perhaps the most important event connected with the administration of Thomas Jefferson, and I dare say no more important event has ever happened in the affairs of our Nation than the purchase of that great territory. In the city of St. Louis we have erected this memorial at a cost of almost half a million dollars in memory of Thomas Jefferson, but in connection only with the Louisiana purchase, in order that we may forever keep fresh in the minds of the people of that great territory this great act of his. There is no one who does not appreciate that great purchase and no one who does not realize what was accomplished by it. The city of St. Louis is the center practically of this great territory that was acquired by Jefferson at that time, and we had there some years ago, as all know, one of the greatest expositions that the country has ever seen, in which we celebrated that event. Now, as we are closing up the affairs of that exposition we think it most fitting and proper that we should expend the amount of money that we have expended in the erection of this memorial to Jefferson and to the Louisiana purchase. That memorial will contain the records and the archives of the Louisiana purchase in connection with this exposition. It will be a great historical thing for the people in the years that are to come, and they will view it and learn of the great event that was accomplished in the administration of the great Jefferson.

We of the committee appointed to go to St. Louis understood and understand now that no money that is appropriated here will be expended for any junketing expedition. This is a most serious and important matter, and there is no Member appointed by the Congress of the United States who would go there and perform this serious and solemn duty who would in any way class his going with a junketing expedition.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. How does the gentleman account for the fact that it takes three hundred and thirty-odd dollars for each individual to go to St. Louis, stay one day, and return?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Texas that I had nothing to do with preparing the resolution providing for the amount; but the resolution does provide that whatever of this amount is needed and necessary for paying the proper and legitimate expenses shall be expended, and I know that I for one would not see a dollar of this expended in connection with my going that is not expended for what is a necessary and a legitimate purpose. This money will be in the hands and under the supervision of the Sergeant at Arms, who is responsible to this House.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman please state to the House what he regards as the legitimate expense of the trip, so that we will have some idea of what may be expended?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I will say to my colleague from Missouri, and I do not speak for the other members of the committee, that going and coming from my home in the city of St. Louis to Washington I expend usually about $75 for the round trip.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT].

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, as I understand this resolution it means simply to carry out an order of this House. During the closing days of the last session a resolution relating to the appointment of a committee was discussed for a considerable length of time. Two economists of the House, my friend from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox], made exactly the same speeches on that occasion, and the result was, after the House had listened to the pros and cons of this question, a vote of 220 in favor and about 26 against the appointment of the committee.

Mr. SISSON. But if the gentleman will permit, there was no appropriation carried in that bill, however. That resolution, too, is dead now, is it not?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. No; it is not. Allow me, I have only two minutes. The House made an order at that time to instruct a committee of this House to go to St. Louis. Now, after that order has been made I hope the House will carry it out and keep its faith——

Mr. SISSON. If the gentleman will permit, $52 is the railroad fare and the sleeping-car fare accommodations to St. Louis and return, is it not?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. This is the concern of the financial officers of the House and Senate, not mine. And in further answer I will say that I have full confidence in the Sergeant at Arms of this House, although he does belong to another party.

Mr. SISSON. Does not the gentleman believe $2,000 would be ample?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Perhaps it would; but the committee did not make the calculation; it was made by the officers of the House and they calculated that the limit of cost should be fixed as specified in the resolution.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Briefly.

Mr. GARNER. I have not sufficient confidence in anyone who made a calculation where it cost $350 for a man to go to St. Louis and return and to stay one day. [Applause.]

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, the fact that $7,000 will constitute the total fund does not mean that that $7,000 must be expended.

Mr. GARNER. But the gentleman said the officers had made the calculation and they were responsible for this $7,000.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. As far as I am concerned you might cut that amount in two.

Mr. GARNER. Is it not a fact when we passed this resolution at the last session of Congress it was then stated it would not exceed $2,500?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I have no recollection of that statement.

Mr. GARNER. Now, why do you make it $7,000?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I do feel, permit me to say in conclusion, that the House ought to send a delegation clothed with the dignity of the American Congress and worthy of the great object for which this delegation was appointed.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago I had the pleasure of speaking in this House for an appropriation of money to build a monument to Abraham Lincoln in the city of Washington. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] voted for that bill appropriating two or three million dollars. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] voted for that bill, and I would like to ask the gentleman how he can excuse himself before a Democratic constituency at home when he votes to erect a monument to a Republican President and declines to pay the expenses of a delegation to witness the unveiling of a monument to a Democratic President? [Applause.]

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman permit me to answer?

Mr. HEFLIN. I have not the time.

Mr. FOSTER. But the gentleman wants to state the facts.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield briefly for one second to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. COX. The difference is this, when I voted to erect a monument to Abe Lincoln there was no appropriation for a junketing trip for Members of the House and Senate of the United States.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Indiana——

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. Just briefly; I have but little time.

Mr. FOSTER. The matter that I voted on last session was for a location, not an appropriation.

Mr. HEFLIN. I can not permit any more interruptions. I am reminded of a statement made in this House by the Senator from Kentucky, OLLIE JAMES, when he called these two gentlemen the twin brothers of 1-cent economy in the House, these two gentlemen who are voting for millions of dollars to erect a monument in one instance, but would decline to expend a few hundred dollars to enable a committee of this House to properly witness the unveiling of a monument to the greatest Democrat and patriot that ever lived. [Applause.]

Two Republicans from Missouri have advocated the passage of this resolution, and two Democrats only on this side have opposed the passage of it. Gentlemen say that it is a junketing trip. Is it a junketing trip for a delegation to represent the dignity of this great Congress at the unveiling of this monument to this great man, costing less than $3,000, probably? I did not prepare the resolution. It was handed to me this morning after I reached the House. I was reminded that this was the last day we could pass a resolution of this kind; and I now wish to say, although the resolution says "$7,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary," I will amend it, if gentlemen will permit me, and make it $2,500 [applause], and pass it through this House. I hope gentlemen, if they are sincere in not expending money uselessly, will grant me unanimous consent to amend this resolution for that purpose.

Gentlemen, this is a great occasion, and the Members are not able to pay their own expenses to St. Louis. The committee has already been appointed. The House has gone on record by a vote of about 200 to 20. This resolution was passed through the Sixty-second Congress; and I stated to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] that I thought Congress ought to pay the expenses of the delegation. I wanted to say to Members, as a member of the committee, that I will return in writing an account of every cent I expend, and I will request it of other gentlemen; and I state to the House now that a bill of particulars in the way of expenses will be given to this House when the committee returns. Gentlemen of the House, do not go on record as opposing the sending of this committee to the unveiling of a monument to Thomas Jefferson.

Mr. GUDGER. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HEFLIN. I have not the time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] declines to yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. Some gentlemen seem to think it would be popular at home to say that they declined to send delegates on a junketing trip. Gentlemen, if some good Democrat, who knows how to put you to the issue before your constituents, will tell them that you stood in the way of expending $3,000 to send Representatives from Congress to the unveiling of a monument to Thomas Jefferson it will hurt you worse than you imagine.

Mr. COX. I will make it the issue any time that you want it.

Mr. HEFLIN. I will state to the gentlemen that the resolution was prepared by some one else and handed to me a little while ago, and I introduced it. It has a saving clause, although it says $7,000. It says, "or so much thereof as may be necessary." But, Mr. Speaker, I always see these stud bugs of economy rise in the House when a proposition like this comes up, and it reminds me of what the governor of Louisiana said about a Florida cracker. Some one asked, "What is a Florida cracker? Describe one to me." He said, "When you are riding through the country on the train look out of the window. If you see a brown object in the woods, it is either a cracker or a stump. If it moves, it is a stump." [Laughter and applause.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I appeal to gentlemen to support this resolution. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] has expired.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to amend the resolution and insert "$2,500" where "$7,000" occurs.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] asks unanimous consent to modify his resolution by substituting "$2,500" for "$7,000."

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to have the resolution reported as it would read if so amended.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution, without objection.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

For defraying the expenses of the members of the committees of the Senate and House of Representatives authorized to attend and represent the Senate and House at the unveiling and dedication of the memorial to Thomas Jefferson at St. Louis, Mo., on April 30, 1913, $2,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, of which sum $3,000——

Mr. HEFLIN. Now, Mr. Speaker, just there. I thank the gentleman from Illinois for calling my attention to that. I think there ought to be inserted "$1,000" for the Senate and "$1,500" for the House.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution accordingly.

The Clerk read as follows:

Of which sum $1,000 shall be accredited to the Senate, to be expended under the direction and by the order of the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate, and $1,500 accredited to the account of and expended under the direction and by the order of the Sergeant at Arms of the House of Representatives, upon vouchers to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate and by the Committee on Accounts of the House, respectively.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the modification of this resolution in the respects read by the Clerk?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the amended resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Cox) there were—ayes 140, noes 57.

Mr. COX. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and forty-seven gentlemen are present—a quorum. Two-thirds having voted in the affirmative, the rules are suspended and the resolution as modified is agreed to.

CONSIDERATION OF SUNDRY CIVIL AND INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 41 (H. Rept. 4).

Resolved, That immediately after the adoption of this rule the House shall proceed to the consideration in the House of the bill (H. R. 2441) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes; that said bill shall be considered under the rules governing general debate during the said day for not exceeding 40 minutes; that at the conclusion of such general debate the bill shall be read in extenso; that the previous question shall then be considered as ordered on the bill to its final passage; that after the final vote thereon the House shall proceed to the consideration in the House of the bill (H. R. 1917) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes; that said bill shall be considered under the rules governing general debate during the said day for not exceeding 40 minutes; that at the conclusion of such general debate the bill shall be read in extenso; that the previous question shall then be considered as ordered on the bill to its final passage; and that this order shall continue from day to day until both of the bills herein mentioned are disposed of.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this resolution be limited to 40 minutes, 20 minutes of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], and 20 minutes by myself, and that at the expiration of the 40 minutes the previous question shall be considered as ordered.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I find difficulty in getting time on the other side to oppose the proposition. Has the gentleman any time on his side that he can give me?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] is interrogating the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU].

Mr. CAMPBELL rose.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of the right to object.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I was not going to make any objection. I was going to make an explanation, that I had yielded already five minutes of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY].

Mr. MURDOCK. And the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] says he will give me an additional two minutes.

Mr. MANN. I think, Mr. Speaker, we are entitled to a reasonable allotment of time.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] wants some time. That would leave no time for me.

Mr. POU. If the proposition is not satisfactory to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], I would be glad to have him make a suggestion.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Say 30 minutes on a side.

Mr. POU. Make it 25 minutes on a side. I suggest to the gentleman from Kansas 25 minutes to a side.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Very well; 25 minutes to a side.

Mr. POU. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that debate be limited to 50 minutes, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] and the other half by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] asks unanimous consent that the debate on this resolution shall not exceed 50 minutes, one-half of the time to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], and that at the end of the 50 minutes the previous question shall be considered as ordered under the rule. Is there objection?

Mr. RODDENBERY. May I ask the gentleman from North Carolina what are the provisions of the rule? I was not in the Chamber at the time it was read.

Mr. POU. The rule provides that two appropriation bills, one the sundry civil and the other the Indian appropriation bill, shall each have 40 minutes' debate, and that at the end of the 40 minutes we shall proceed to vote upon the bills.

Mr. BARTLETT. The bill would have to be read, of course.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I have reference particularly to the sundry civil bill. The rule provides for the consideration of the sundry civil bill just as introduced in the House?

Mr. POU. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] is recognized for 25 minutes.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, this resolution reported by the Committee on Rules provides for immediate consideration of two appropriation bills which failed of passage during the last Congress. One of these, as has been said, is the sundry civil bill, and the other is the Indian appropriation bill.

The fact that these two bills were passed by the last Congress is, in the opinion of the Committee on Rules, a sufficient justification for the reporting of this rule.

Both of these bills passed both Houses in the last Congress. One of them was vetoed by the President. The other was passed by the House and by the Senate and went to the conferees, who failed to agree. These two bills as introduced, as I understand it, are in almost the exact form of the two bills which failed in the last Congress. I reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman reserves the remainder of his time. He used two minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman from North Carolina use a little more of his time?

Mr. POU. There is no gentleman on this side who cares to be heard at this time.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY].

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I only desire sufficient time to submit to the House that the argument made by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] is hardly sufficient to carry conviction on a measure of this kind. My protest is based on two distinct propositions. One is that this is a special rule brought out from the Rules Committee to take care of a bill of vital importance, with only 40 minutes' debate allowed; and from the vantage point of that Rules Committee I feel convinced that such an order in this individual case is unjustifiable. I am convinced also that it is unjustifiable as a general policy.

I submit to the House that a bill of this importance, covering 200 pages as it does, with over 150 separate and distinct headings, and with a myriad of subjects included, is of such a nature that it can not be properly considered in 40 minutes. The fact that it has been considered by a previous House, that it has been passed by Congress and vetoed by the President, is but another argument in favor of the proposition that it demands further consideration before passage. For this reason I am opposed to its consideration under this special rule.

Besides that, I believe there is another feature which is more important, and that is the fact that it is the beginning of a policy of introducing from the Rules Committee special rules to advance certain legislation and to retard other legislation.

This is the first time in this session when such a step has been taken, and it is the beginning of a policy.

We have heard so much here this morning about that sage of Monticello, Thomas Jefferson, that I would like to read from his manual a line or two on this very point of these special rules being brought in to overthrow various regular rules. After quoting the famous maxim which is found at the very beginning of his manual, he goes on to say:

> So far the maxim is certainly true, and is founded in good sense, that as it is always in the power of the majority, by their numbers, to stop any improper measures proposed on the part of their opponents, the only weapons by which the minority can defend themselves against similar attempts from those in power are the forms and rules of proceeding which have been adopted as they were found necessary, from time to time, and are become the law of the House, by a strict adherence to which the weaker party can only be protected from those irregularities and abuses which these forms were intended to check, and which the wantonness of power is but too often apt to suggest to large and successful majorities.
> And whether these forms be in all cases the most rational or not is really not of so great importance. It is much more material that there should be a rule to go by than what that rule is—that there may be a uniformity of proceeding in business not subject to the caprice of the Speaker or captiousness of the Members. It is very material that order, decency, and regularity be preserved in a dignified public body.

Now, I submit that the systematic practice of bringing in special rules tends to take away all vestige of representation from the minority. I believe that as a just proposition this bill itself should be considered carefully and well. It has not had committee consideration; it can not have had committee consideration. It is reported here without full investigation, or any investigation, and it is proposed to pass it in 40 minutes. Some of us are fresh from the people, as was remarked here this morning, and we are here bearing a commission to see that public business shall be transacted in the open—that the sunlight shall be let in on some business that has hitherto been transacted in star-chamber sessions. That is one feature of this matter. I believe that the Democratic Party is not wholly responsible for these special rules. I believe that the opposition party which was in the majority some time ago, but now is in the minority, had the same rule, word for word, as is now brought in by the Democratic majority, and so it comes with ill grace from that party to say anything against it. But there is an organization on the floor of this House which can come with clean hands to this proposition and can say that we want public business transacted out in the open. Scientists have said that tuberculosis germs can be cured by sunlight, and so we say that the germs of political jugglery can be cured by the sunlight of publicity. [Applause.]

For that reason we stand for the policy which declares that the House is greater than any of its committees, greater than any creature that it has created, and that here is the place to thrash out the public business in the open and decide fairly and squarely as to the merits of individual measures, with full and fair consideration of matters touching the conduct of public business. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. Does the gentleman from North Carolina expect to use any more of his time?

Mr. POU. Yes. I will yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, this bill provides for the consideration of two appropriation bills that failed in the last Congress. One is the sundry civil appropriation bill, carrying $116,795,327.01. It was vetoed by the President of the United States because of two limitations on the appropriations contained in the bill. A reading of the President's veto will show that he had never examined the two provisions carefully or he would not have made the comprehensive statement regarding their effect which he inserted in the message.

The House passed the bill over the President's veto by a vote of nearly 6 to 1—257 to 48—so that the overwhelming sentiment of the House was in favor of the bill as agreed upon in conference. It was not acted upon in the Senate because the bill reached the Senate within 10 minutes of the time fixed for adjournment, and no opportunity was had to have a vote on it. The bill as agreed upon in conference was $3,512,106 more than it was when it passed the House. In other words, the Senate, a coordinate branch of the legislative body, did not increase the bill, carrying $113,000,000, by more than $3,000,000.

As it passed the Senate it carried $119,643,000, or $6,359,000 in excess of the bill as it passed the House.

So that in the adjustment of the differences about one-half of the $6,000,000 that had been added by the Senate was stricken out of the bill. This bill is less, as finally agreed upon, by $1,331,655 than the sundry civil bill for the current fiscal year, although the bill now before the House contains items aggregating $6,087,798 which were transferred from the permanent and other appropriations into the sundry civil bill. If these transfers had not been made, this bill would have been $7,500,000 less that the bill for the current year. The bill for the current year was $2,511,061 less than the sundry civil bill for 1912.

That was the last year for which a Republican Congress appropriated. The first session in which the Democrats were called upon to appropriate in a sundry civil appropriation bill they reduced the bill by $24,511,000 under the amount carried by the one prepared by Republicans, and for the current year practically $7,000,000 additional; so that this bill is, in effect, $31,000,000 less than the last bill handled by the Republican Congress.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman what is the total of this bill?

Mr. FITZGERALD. One hundred and sixteen million seven hundred and ninety-five thousand three hundred and twenty-seven dollars.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. Will there be any opportunity at all under this rule to offer amendments to the bill?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, under this rule, because of the incorporation in the present rules of the House of the so-called Fitzgerald amendments, there will be an opportunity to do at this time what could not have been done 20 years ago, when a similar procedure was followed. That is, the minority, or the opposition to this bill, will be able to move to recommit with instructions, in which instructions it will be possible for them to set out the particular changes they believe should be made in the bill, and obtain the opinion of the House by a record vote.

Mr. MOORE. But there will be no opportunity to offer amendments as the bill is read. The bill has to be read under the rule, and there will be no opportunity under that rule to offer amendments.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand that there will not be, and in view of the fact that the House by a vote of more than 5 to 1, including, if I be not mistaken, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, voted for this bill, I do not believe there should be any particular anxiety on his part to offer any amendment to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, in the Fifty-fourth Congress four appropriation bills failed, and at the beginning of the Fifty-fifth Congress a rule was introduced for their consideration, iden ical with the rule now under consideration. It was the opinion that as this bill represented practically completed legislation, as months had been spent in its preparation, as the House and Senate had had full opportunity to consider and did consider each item in the bill when it was before the House and the Senate, there was not the same necessity for that consideration at this time. In the Fifty-fifth Congress the Republicans asserted that the imperative necessity speedily to take up tariff legislation compelled the prompt consideration of the bills then undisposed of. The same reason exists now. If gentlemen condemn this rule, let me suggest to them that as it provides for the consideration of only two appropriation bills, instead of four, comparing it with the rule of the Fifty-fifth Congress, depending upon the standpoint from which it is viewed, it is either only half as bad or twice as good as the rule adopted in the Republican Congress. There is at this time an advantage, to which I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] will give some attention when he speaks, as I see he has the debate in the Fifty-fifth Congress on his knee, that under the rule adopted at that time there was no opportunity on the part of the minority—that is, no opportunity secured by the rules of the House—to obtain recognition to move to recommit any one of the four bills considered at that time and to have a vote upon any matter of importance that might be desired by the minority.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman quite sure about that statement?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Quite sure. I said there was no opportunity secured by the rules of the House by which the minority could obtain recognition to move to recommit.

Mr. MANN. But the rules did secure to the minority at that time the right to move to recommit.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is mistaken. It had long been the practice in this House, established by repeated rulings, that the gentleman in charge of the bill was entitled to preference in recognition on a motion to recommit.

Mr. MANN. But he made no such motion, and so the minority had the right to make the motion.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The minority might have had the right, but under the practice in the House the gentleman from Illinois in charge of bills, when he had a more powerful and more numerous and better disciplined following, until the adoption of the rule to which I have referred, known as one of the Fitzgerald amendments, never gave the minority the opportunity to make such motions, because the gentleman from Illinois himself was an expert in the art, as the Member in charge of a bill, of making the motion to recommit, moving the previous question, and depriving the minority of any opportunity ever to have its views as desired to be written into legislation voted upon by the House. Now, however, as a result of the amendment to the rules, prepared by myself, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], or whoever cooperating with him so desires, will have an opportunity to make the motion to recommit, and the minority can not be deprived of that right under the rules.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, at each succeeding session of Congress since the Democrats have been in power I have been able to say that rules coming from the Committee on Rules have been more drastic than any that have preceded, and I am able to say that of this rule—for there is no man who was a Member of the last Congress but will admit that this rule is more drastic than any which was ever presented during that Congress—it shuts off all power of amendment, it shuts off all debate, practically, upon a great bill—196 pages of it—and their excuse is that in the Fifty-fifth Congress, when four appropriation bills had failed during the session preceding, the Republicans offered a similar rule. As the gentleman from New York has said, this rule was word for word similar to that rule offered by the Republicans. They not only admit it, Mr. Speaker, but they boast of it, and I want to call the attention of the Democratic side to the RECORD, which shows that then, upon this same rule, word for word, instead of supporting it, every Member on the Democratic side in that Congress voted against that rule. I want to call attention, Mr. Speaker, to some of the distinguished men who are Members of this House who then voted against that rule which they now propose to support. Among them was Mr. ADAMSON, the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The next I find is Mr. CLARK of Missouri, the distinguished Speaker of this House, who then voted against this rule, which presumably he is now for.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. For a moment.

Mr. HARDWICK. Can the gentleman find the names of any Republicans over there who are still here who voted for it?

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, yes; I can. Mr. CLAYTON, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, voted against it. Also Mr. HENRY, the chairman of the Rules Committee. My friend Mr. KITCHIN, Mr. MOON, Mr. RICHARDSON, Mr. SIMS, Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland, and last, but not least, Mr. UNDERWOOD, the present leader of the majority upon that side, voted against this rule upon a similar bill which you now propose to vote for. Mr. Speaker, I am reminded of that old, old saying that "When the devil was sick, the devil a monk would be, but when the devil was well the devil a monk was he." But, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; I will yield for a question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is not the gentleman aware that one bill, the sundry civil, carried by that rule had not been passed by the Fifty-fourth Congress in the ordinary way of proceeding under the rules, but had been passed, under suspension of the rules, in the closing hours of the session, and the complaint of the Democrats was that no opportunity had ever been given to the House to consider it under the rules of the House?

Mr. LENROOT. I will call the gentleman's attention now to what the complaint was, and I want to read from the debate for a moment. The then leader of the Democratic minority was Mr. McMillin, and in opening the debate he said——

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; the gentleman is mistaken——

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Reed was Speaker—

Mr. Speaker, you, if I may speak personally, changed the rules of this House for the purpose, as was claimed, of enabling the House "to do business." Now it is proposed by this special rule to set aside all the rules of the House in order to have the House "do business." It is unfortunate if, after so long and fierce a controversy, your contention has wholly failed of its purpose. What is the proposition here? A new Congress has met—

That is true now.

Four important appropriation bills failed in the last Congress—

In this case there are two.

They involve an expenditure of $72,000,000—

Here nearly $150,000,000.

There are 148 Members of Congress in this body who were not in the last Congress—

In this House there are 154 new Members who were not Members of the last Congress—and who had nothing to do with the consideration of those bills in that Congress. It is now proposed that those 148 Members tie themselves, shut their eyes, and, like young birds, take whatever is administered to them, whether it be good or not.

That was the main objection then. He proceeds:

Under the general rules of debate these bills are to be considered. And what are the general rules of debate? One is that the first man who gets the floor can occupy it for an hour. Therefore, the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. Cannon, rising to one bill or to all four bills—will have it in his power to occupy the whole time in debate, never yielding the floor to anyone else; and whether he yields it or not, the House will have already cut off from itself the right to deliberately consider the measures.

In this case the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD]—

That was good logic then. If I had been a Member of the House then, I would have agreed with it. And it is good logic now. He concludes his remarks with this paragraph:

Is it possible you are afraid of the House, afraid of yourselves, afraid to trust the representatives of the people? Let us not abandon the prerogatives and customs of the House.

It ought to appeal to you now. This man was then a leader of that Congress.

The next man who participated in that debate was the late Mr. De Armond, not only one of the ablest Democrats who ever sat in this House, but one of the ablest and most patriotic men who ever sat upon either side of the aisle. [Applause.] He said, with reference to this rule:

I venture to say that legislative history will not produce a parallel to the outrage of this legislation.

And this is exactly the same rule.

Here is the greatest appropriation bill of all the appropriation bills.

That was the sundry civil bill and this is the sundry civil bill—

And the greatest of its class ever submitted to this House or to any other representative body of free people. This bill is to be twice passed. Once when the session was well-nigh run, once when the session was just begun.

Just exactly as is the case to-day.

Twice it is to be put through the House, without any opportunity for amendment, without opportunity for criticism. Under what plea? There is not even time given to state that.

And a little later another distinguished Democrat participated in that debate, and I want to quote from him, namely, Mr. Handy. He said:

Far be it from me, Mr. Speaker, to seek to cripple the public service by inadequate appropriations, but am I not entitled, is not every new Member of this House fairly entitled, to an opportunity to examine the provisions of these bills? I appeal to the older Members of this House, to the gentlemen who framed these bills, and to those who became familiar with them in the last House, to give us new Members some chance for discussion, some privilege of amendment, some opportunity for investigation, before they force us to vote "yes" or "no" on bills that carry $72,000,000 in bulk.

Only half as much as these bills carry.

Why, Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether any legislative body in the history of the world ever voted such a sum of money on such brief and inadequate discussion and consideration.

Do you suppose, Mr. Speaker, that at that time you thought, or that any of those men who were Members of the House thought, that the time would ever come when the Democrats then opposing a rule like this would themselves offer one identical in terms, sentence for sentence and word for word? He goes on to say:

These bills have never been considered by a committee of this House. We have as yet no Appropriation Committee to consider them. Seventy-two millions of dollars with 160 minutes of discussion! Nearly $500,000 a minute! The sundry civil bill alone carries $53,000,000.

This one to-day carries $116,000,000.

And it is proposed to pass it after 40 minutes of discussion! Here we are to make the unparalleled record in appropriation of a million of minute.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] has expired.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman who has just spoken, with that ability that always characterizes him, read part of the speech of the gentleman from Missouri, the late Mr. De Armond. He did not read that part of the speech which called the attention of the House to the fact that the great sundry civil bill that the Republicans were at that time undertaking to put through under special rule had never been considered in any Congress with the right to offer amendment or to consider individual items. The previous year that sundry civil bill had been passed under suspension of the rules, without the right to amend, and one of the items carried in it, and one of the items that caused the most adverse comment, was a provision establishing the Danville Soldiers' Home, that could not have been passed if it had ever been brought out on the floor for a fair debate, with the right of amendment.

The proposition which confronts this House now is entirely distinct from that which confronted that House at that time. At that time there was a bill which, I repeat, had never been considered by the House except as a whole. It had never been considered item by item. Here is a bill that the gentleman himself knows was considered carefully item by item, with full opportunity for debate and with full opportunity for amendment. It represented no partisan view of any man on this side of the Chamber. It was simply one of the great supply bills, properly considered and properly passed.

It went to the President of the United States, and he, on account of a specific item, vetoed the bill, and it came back to the membership of the last House; and its Members were so satisfied with the bill that by a vote of 5 to 1 they passed it over his veto. And yet the gentleman would try to give to the country the impression that we are undertaking to stifle debate; that we are undertaking to pass over a great supply bill that represents simply the wisdom or the judgment of one gentleman, the gentleman who introduced it.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the gentleman think that 154 new Members of the House are not entitled to an opportunity?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think the reasoning on which the question is predicated would require the opening up of every supply bill that has been passed where the money carried by it has not been expended. There is no reason in logic why these one hundred and odd new Members could not just as well say, "Here is the provision made for the Navy in the coming year, after July 1. The money has not been expended. We are fresh from the people. We should have the right to open it up and reconsider the matter." The gentleman knows that the logic is specious; that it does not really state the case.

If there had been an attempt to prevent consideration by the Congress; if the previous House had not considered it on its merits, as was the case that the gentleman cites, back in the Fifty-fourth Congress, then there would be some reason for the gentleman's position. But now it is simply the captious criticism of a man that desires to show that because complaint was made of a rule under certain circumstances, we should not now present a rule under entirely different circumstances.

Here is a bill that is in amount less than the bills that have preceded it; a bill that has brought economy. That bill that the gentleman refers to was a bill so extravagant that the Republicans did not dare on either occasion to leave it open for amendment or consideration by the membership of the House.

Now, I have not believed in unduly tying the membership. Neither have I been one of those men who have thought that there was a viciousness in the fact that a rule was a special rule. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] read, and properly read, from Jefferson that the rules were intended for the protection of the minority, and therefore there should be no special rules. It is true that they are intended for the protection of the minority, and under ordinary circumstances fairness requires the ordinary rules to be in effect. But it was never suspected by anybody who recognized the necessity of doing practical things in a practical way that there should not be from time to time special rules in order that business might be expedited.

What is the condition that confronts the country that the gentleman's plan would altogether upset? There are certain moneys carried in this bill that are made immediately available. There is certain work—certain work on the Panama Canal and certain other work of the highest importance—that is being held back because of the lack of supplies. But the gentleman, because of the belief that the new Members should have an opportunity, would hold up all of these public matters in order that this bill might be reopened and rediscussed.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. He talks of the new Members coming fresh from the country. We all come fresh from the country every two years, and we believe that there has been a proper consideration of this bill and that there is no need of a second consideration. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] use the remainder of his time? We have only one more speech on this side.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to my colleague from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, it is not at all remarkable that this gag rule should have been brought in, but it is remarkable that it should be brought in so early in the new Congress.

Now, the fact of the business is that the Democratic leadership in this body, with a majority of 147 behind them, has become overbold. If the Democratic leadership of this body were not overbold, it would not launch out in the beginning of a session with an outrageous gag rule of this kind. The thing that is unbelievable is that most of the 154 new Members of Congress will permit without protest the passage without consideration of a bill carrying $116,000,000, of which they know absolutely nothing. There are two methods of debate in considering a bill in this House. One is known as "general debate," a provision for a period of time during which Members have the right to debate diversely if they desire, not to the point and not pertinently to the measure under consideration. The Democratic leadership of this House have given you 40 minutes of that sort of consideration for this sundry civil bill, which is one of the great bills of the Congress.

There is another method for the consideration of bills in this House, which is known as consideration under the "five-minute rule." It is our most workmanlike method of consideration, a method under which the individual here has maintained his rights. The bill is read by paragraphs, and at the end of a paragraph any Member is entitled to the right to debate that paragraph pertinently, and to offer amendments to it. I want to point out to the new Members of this House on both the Democratic and the Republican sides that they are surrendering the right to that five-minute rule when they adopt this special rule brought in by the Committee on Rules. I assert also that this rule would not be brought in if the Democratic majority were five or ten or fifteen Members. No leader would dare bring in such a gag rule if the majority were so small as that, but it is because the leaders feel sure, with a majority of 147, that they attempt this sort of thing. It is in line with the practice of deferring committee appointments with regard to the tariff bill. There is no reason at all why the Democratic Members of this House should not have their committee appointments now. Why do you not get them now? Because the Democratic leaders of this House are applying the whip and lash to your backs and holding off the committee appointments in order that they may drive you into a favorable vote upon a secretly prepared tariff measure.

It is unbelievable, I say, that any fortunate enough citizen to be a Member of the American Congress would swallow a gag like this and submit to a leadership which is imposing this rule upon him on the theory that he has not the spirit to protest.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MURDOCK. Certainly, I will yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not yield, because he has no time remaining.

Mr. HARDWICK. I will give the gentleman one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia yields one minute.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to inquire whether the gentleman objects to the cutting off of debate or to the cutting off of the opportunity of amendment?

Mr. MURDOCK. Now, the gentleman proposes, I suppose, to say that under some halfway measure he fathered several years ago it is in order to move to recommit this bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I do not. I am asking the gentleman whether he objects to the cutting off of the opportunity for debate.

Mr. MURDOCK. I object to the gag rule which cuts off every Member of this House from the right to have this bill considered under the five-minute rule, a paragraph at a time, with full opportunity to debate and amend.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will permit me, I was anxious to know whether he objected to the cutting off of the opportunity of Members to speak or the opportunity of Members to offer amendments.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman permit me——

Mr. FITZGERALD. One moment.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman knows that there is often too much general debate and not enough five-minute debate.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman has not pointed out any respect in which he desired the bill to be amended, but the gentleman must remember that on the openin; day of the House he did not desire to permit Members to discuss a motion which he then made, because he moved the previous question for the purpose of cutting off debate.

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes; and the House voted down the previous question and then adopted a substitute proposition after the gentleman's debate had preceded the motion for the previous question, which shut off the debate we desired, which it had a perfect right to do.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, the House can vote down this rule.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] yield me more time?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Eight minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, my skirts are clear in the main at least. I did not move the previous question on the opening day on a resolution which I offered in regard to the swearing in of a Member.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But the gentleman voted for this rule in the Fifty-fifth Congress.

Mr. MANN. Nor do I propose to move the previous question to prevent debate or amendments to the sundry civil bill. In the Fifty-fourth Congress Mr. Cleveland was the President. The House was Republican. The bill failed, and a Republican President came in with the Fifty-fifth Congress and a Republican House. It is true that the same procedure was then adopted as is proposed to be adopted now.

A few moments ago I stepped out into the lobby back of the Speaker's chair and looked at the marble face of the statue of Uncle Joe Cannon, and I found it in a broad grin. [Laughter.]

It was Uncle Joe who drew the resolution 16 years ago for the passage of the sundry civil bill without amendment and without debate. It was your side which for 16 years has been reviling Cannon and Cannonism, and now the only defense you can make for what you are doing is that you are doing what Uncle Joe did 16 years ago. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] state that they have no such precedent. That is true; they have never made a precedent in the past, and I think they will never have an opportunity to make one in the future. [Laughter.] Having done nothing, having no responsibility, nobody can charge anything up to them. [Laughter.] It is true that the Republicans when they had the responsibility passed the bill. It is true that when the Democrats have the responsibility they propose to supply the necessary funds to carry on the Government. It is true that the minority, following the precedents of all ages, insist upon the right to talk and propose amendments. It is true that when we were in the majority we did not give you a chance, and you told the country how we inflicted this punishment upon you and perpetrated this outrage on a free Government. It is true that you are proposing to do the same old thing, in the same old way, with the same old excuse. You secured your power by playing a confidence game on the American people, and they are finding it out, and shortly we will be having the power to do the thing that you are now doing, and I do not know but that we will have the same old excuse. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt that many of the 154 Members who are serving their first term here are wondering why it is that we are proceeding in the manner in which we are now proceeding. It is a simple matter. The tariff bill has not yet passed; it is not absolutely certain how you are going to vote on some items in that bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, yes, it is.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It is not absolutely certain how you will vote on the bill when it is finally passed.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman is not posted. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. These uncertainties have made it unwise on the part of the leadership to appoint the committees. You have not had the committee assignments you figured on immediately after the election. You have also been wondering why you have not been getting some of those post offices that the folks back home are hammering you about from every town and village in your district. Why, the tariff bill is not passed. How can you expect the goods to be delivered until you have delivered the goods? [Laughter.]

That is the reason that you are called upon to-day to pass a bill appropriating over $100,000,000 for the civil service of the Government and to pass the Indian appropriation bill, which is not only bad for what it contains but is worse for what it does not contain.

You are asked to pass these bills without an opportunity of offering a single amendment, without the opportunity of improving them in any manner whatever, and in fact without an opportunity of knowing very much of what is in either of them. You have come here believing that you were all of some importance. Why, you have not been of sufficient importance yet to find out just what committee you are going to get; where you are going to be assigned. One or two men have been telling you exactly what to do and how to do it, and if you are wise you will do just what they tell you to do. [Laughter.]

That is to say, if you are to get the committee assignments that you want, and if you are to get the fellows appointed for postmasters back home that you want, you must act well your part. Very much depends, therefore, on how you act in the near future on the tariff bill that foreign manufacturers are so anxious for. It is two weeks since this Congress convened. Only 4 committees out of something like 40 have been appointed. It is yet several weeks until the 1st day of July. These appropriation bills that you are proposing to put through this House after 40 minutes of general debate are for the fiscal year beginning on the 1st day of July next. There is plenty of time to pass them in the orderly way. But the committees will not be appointed until you vote on the tariff bill.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Nine minutes.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I have been a little amused to-day at some of these Republican experiences that we have been hearing.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. I want to ask the chairman of the committee if he does not think this report ought to be voted down on account of the Platt National Park being left out?

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I say that I have been somewhat amused at some of the Republican experiences and confidences that we have been given to-day. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], who is high in the favor of that party, intimates that four years ago, when they were passing that monstrosity known as the Payne-Aldrich bill, they held up their committees for just that reason, because that was exactly what was done; and when the Dingley bill was passed you held up your committees, except the Ways and Means and the Committe on Rules, and I suppose your President and bosses were hitting you over the heads then, and you had to do it all under the one-man system, and that man had to see that you delivered the goods, and he did see to it.

On our side what has happened is simply this: The committee charged with the duty of appointing committees can not lay down the tariff bill and name these committees at this time. They have assured this side of the House, and they have made the statement public, that just as soon as the tariff can be passed and they can have the time to do the actual labor involved the committees will be announced. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. Of course they will.

Mr. HARDWICK. There is no trouble about that, and you gentlemen did not do that while you were running under your one-man system. There is another thing that really amuses me——

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. There does not seem to be any dispute in the gentleman's mind about the one-man system on both sides.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; I have no trouble about that. [Laughter.] We have on this side a committee that acts as a committee on committees, but they are not in any sense the bosses of the House. There are 14 members on that committee, and that is 14 times as good as your system, and that is about as big as the whole party of my friend from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK.] [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, it agonizes my soul to hear my good friend from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] talk about gag rules. That has been the principal part of his stock in trade, and I think he has a little overdone it. The trouble we found with the "gag" rule that you proposed in the Fifty-fifth Congress and which your party, many of whom sit on this floor now, voted for, and if you other gentlemen had been there I suppose you would have voted for it, too, in those good old days of Republicanism; the trouble about it was that you had a sundry civil bill that never had been considered under the five-minute rule, where there had never been opportunity for real debate or substantial amendment, and you proposed to pass it the second time without consideration. On the other hand, what do we do? We take up this sundry civil bill after it has been considered with great care as to every paragraph and every item under the five-minute rule, after full debate, and with unlimited opportunity for amendment. Not only that, but it has been passed by the Senate, considered by that body, has been through conference, and after it has met a veto from the President of the United States it has been passed in this House, which had then a Democratic majority of only 64, by a vote of 5 to 1, almost every Republican, as well as every Democrat, certifying to the country that the bill was right and ought to become a law.

Mr. LENROOT. What about the other three bills that had been passed?

Mr. HARDWICK. My understanding is that the deficiency bill in the Fifty-fourth Congress was passed under about the same circumstances as the sundry civil bill. However, the principal bill involved then, as now, was the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The bill had never been agreed to in conference.

Mr. HARDWICK. No. The conferees had never agreed on it, as I recall it.

Mr. CANTRILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. CANTRILL. I would like to remind my colleague while he is on the floor to call the attention of the House to the fact that the Democratic leader submitted the question to the Democratic caucus as to whether or not they should proceed with the tariff bill or proceed to name the committees, and the rank and file—the Democratic Party in Democratic caucus—instructed our leader to proceed with the tariff bill and then name the committees.

Mr. HARDWICK. Undoubtedly.

Mr. CANTRILL. And the Ways and Means Committee did not undertake to boss that caucus, but the caucus bossed the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. HARDWICK. Undoubtedly; and I want to tell my friends on the other side of the Chamber that if we had had little enough sense to unduly protract the period of this tariff revision and unduly prolong the uncertainty with which business regards any sort of a tariff change, whether up or down while scrambling over committee pie, our party would be ridiculous in the eyes of the American people. Now, another thing I want to say to my good friend from the State of Illinois, the able and astute Republican leader on the other side: He said when he went out here he imagined he could see the marble statue of Uncle Joe smile on account of this rule. If he could have seen Uncle Joe when the original bill passed in the Fifty-fifth Congress he would no doubt have seen him smile a great deal more than in imagination he can see the statue smile to-day; because in that bill, that was never considered under the five-minute rule, there was an item for a soldiers' home, at a cost of $150,000, provided for at Danville, Ill.; but I am glad that when the Democratic Party brings in a bill of this kind no such charge can be laid at the door of its chairman.

Mr. BARTLETT. And for a soldier's home in his own home town.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; in Danville, Ill. Then another thing was involved in this rule. Why did we present this rule? We say this bill has been considered thoroughly, paragraph by paragraph and item by item, and that the light of day had been turned on the bill in both Chambers of this Congress. We say more—that this House by a five-sixths vote passed it just as we offer it to you, over the veto of the President of the United States. We say more. This bill—and the Indian appropriation bill in the same way to a smaller degree—contains about $28,000,000 of actual necessary appropriations for public works that are halted unless we pass these bills in the immediate future. It contains $12,000,000 or $14,000,000 for public works that under the statutes are available continuously, regardless of the date fixed by the bill. Not only that, but it contains about $8,000,000 or $10,000,000, I am informed, of river and harbor works, besides the Panama Canal provisions. We say that the country does not wish the tariff bill to be halted while we carry this bill through a weary process of two or three weeks of debate and delay on the floor of this House, and therefore we offer this bill that has been thoroughly considered—every line, every item, every paragraph—and we ask you to pass it now before we go into the tariff discussion, before we come to the consideration of the tariff bill, because if we do not pass it until that time we can not pass it at a time when the public works of the country will not suffer because of the delay.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]?

Mr. HARDWICK. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman referred to the vote on the veto message of the President——

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think it would be quite fair to say that that vote was had during the last three hours of the expiration of the term of Congress, when it was a question of taking that bill or nothing; that that does not necessarily indicate how the gentlemen would vote——

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not think it indicates, however, that Members of this House, knowing this extra session was about to be convened, would have their judgment coerced to vote wrongfully to pass a bill over the President's veto unless they thought the bill was right; and I want to say to the gentleman I would not support the bill if as a whole I had not thought it ought to pass, the President's veto to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does not the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] think that the gentleman from Illinois should have remembered that the sundry civil bill was brought in during the last three hours of the session in the Fifty-fourth Congress when he was criticizing Democrats for bringing in the bills in the manner in which they were brought in in the last Congress?

Mr. MANN. It was not brought in during the last three hours of the session of the Fifty-fourth Congress.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] said that in the bill in the Fifty-fourth Congress there was appropriated $125,000 for a soldiers' home——

Mr. HARDWICK. I said "$150,000."

Mr. CAMPBELL. And then went on to compliment the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of this Congress that his town got nothing out of it. I will call his attention to the fact that he got $500,000 for his home town in this bill.

Mr. HARDWICK. The city of New York is about the same size as Danville, Ill., I take it, and the items in question are of equal public importance?

Mr. CAMPBELL. It is his home town.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It was an appropriation for existing work now under way, and authorized by a Republican administration.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] has expired. All time has expired. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 126, noes 94.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 221, nays 110, answered "present" 4, not voting 97, as follows:

So the resolution was agreed to.

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

For the session:

Mr. SCULLY with Mr. BROWNING.

For the vote:

Mr. FIELDS with Mr. STEENERSON.

Until further notice:

Mr. RIORDAN with Mr. KIESS of Pennsylvania.

Mr. SAUNDERS with Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND.

Mr. WHITE with Mr. MADDEN.

Mr. WATKINS with Mr. NELSON.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland with Mr. PAYNE.

Mr. STEDMAN with Mr. PORTER.

Mr. CURLEY with Mr. BARCHFELD.

Mr. GITTINS with Mr. AVIS.

Mr. BATHRICK with Mr. ANTHONY.

Mr. ADAIR with Mr. AINEY.

Mr. HOBSON with Mr. BUTLER.

Mr. HAMLIN with Mr. CALDER.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, I voted "no"; but I am paired with my colleague, Mr. SCULLY, and I desire to withdraw my vote and vote "present."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. BROWNING, and he answered "Present."

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall, listening?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think the usual question ought to be asked these gentlemen.

The SPEAKER. That is what I asked the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. MANN. The Speaker asked part of it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asked the gentleman if he was in the Hall, listening.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but I think that the new Members ought to know what the requirements are.

The SPEAKER. Of course. The real question is, "Were you in the Hall, listening, when your name was called, or ought to be called?"

Mr. BARNHART. I was not listening, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman does not bring himself within the rule.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. SCULLY, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for five days, on account of illness.

THOMAS JEFFERSON MEMORIAL, ST. LOUIS, MO.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, the resolution that passed the House a little while ago, in regard to the unveiling of the Jefferson Monument, was amended, but it is necessary also to amend the title. I ask that the title be amended.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] asks unanimous consent to amend the title to that Jefferson resolution.

Mr. MANN. Did it have a title before?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. HEFLIN. It is desired to give it a title.

The SPEAKER. The request of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] is to give it a title, unless somebody objects. The Clerk will report the title that is proposed to be prefixed to the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution making an appropriation for defraying the expenses of the committees of the Senate and House of Representatives authorized to attend and represent the Senate and House at the unveiling and dedication of the memorial to Thomas Jefferson, at St. Louis, Mo.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PRINTING OF THE TARIFF BILL.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I reintroduced the tariff bill this morning, with certain amendments. Under its new number it is numbered 3321. I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed 10,000 copies of the bill, of which 2,000 shall be for the use of the committee. We have that many requests for it, or requests approximating that many. Two thousand are to be allotted to the document room, and the balance are to be distributed to Members in the folding room.

The Clerk read the following resolution:

House resolution 69.

Resolved, That 10,000 copies H. R. 3321 be printed, 2,000 for Ways and Means Committee, 2,000 for document room, and 6,000 to folding room.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The bill is introduced to-day with the changes made by the Democratic caucus, I assume?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. It is reintroduced as an original bill, is it not? It does not show the amendments?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is introduced as an original bill.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman expect the Ways and Means Committee to act upon it to-morrow?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. MANN. It will probably be acted upon without change?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman prefer to have 10,000 copies of it printed now instead of waiting until it is reported back?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do; for two reasons. One reason is that it is more convenient to the Printing Office, and the other is that there is a demand for copies of the bill immediately, and we will have them here to-morrow.

Mr. MANN. I do not know that the gentleman from Alabama can give us assurances, and yet if the country can be thoroughly well assured that there will be no change made in the Committee on Ways and Means, so that the bill as introduced would be in fact the bill as reported, then we shall know what to expect.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman that there are 14 Members out of the membership of the Committee on Ways and Means who are committed to the bill as introduced, and I expect to get 14 votes in committee in the morning to report it back to the House.

Mr. MANN. What is the gentleman's program about taking up the bill? Does he propose to take it up on Wednesday?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My desire is to report it to the House to-morrow and take it up on Wednesday.

Mr. MANN. It will not be taken up to-morrow?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; not to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent that 10,000 copies of the bill that he introduced to-day on the tariff be printed, 2,000 copies for the use of the committee, 2,000 to go to the document room, and the remainder to go to the folding room.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. How about printing the handbook containing the tariff data?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I intend, when I file the report, to make the handbook an appendix to the report, and I will ask unanimous consent at that time for printing the number of copies that the House desires.

Mr. DYER. Reserving the right to object, are there any of the handbooks that have been printed now available?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think they are practically all exhausted; they had to be changed to meet some of the amendments.

Mr. DYER. I could not get a single copy.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There was only a limited number printed because it was expected that there might be changes, and the handbook had to be changed to correspond with the changes in the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is recognized.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MANN. I will ask the gentleman from New York if we can have some arrangement for a division of time?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand that under the rule I am recognized for the 40 minutes. I am willing to yield one-half of that time to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT], who was the senior member of the Committee on Appropriations on that side in the last Congress. I now yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts 20 minutes.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, this bill, like the rule under which it is considered, is an exemplification of Democratic insincerity. For 20 years this House has rung with denunciation of Czar Reed and Czar Cannon, and professions that just as soon as the Democratic Party had control this tyranny would be done away with. Now, at the very beginning of their control, we see them select as their model for a rule the most drastic rule that the combined invention of these two czars was ever able to contrive. [Laughter.]

So for 20 years while the Democratic Party was out they have been professing that they were the champions of economy. They have been denouncing Republican extravagance, and have been telling us that just as soon as they came into power they would illustrate to us Democratic simplicity and economy. When they came into power in this House two years ago, they did begin to show some evidences of a desire for economy. The bills which the Appropriations Committee brought in in the first session did prune down appropriation bills. The Democratic platform of last year demanded the abolition of useless offices, denounced Republican extravagance, and promised fundamental changes and economy.

But what did they do after election? What did they do in the second session of that Congress? Just as soon as the election had passed by, just as soon as they had sailed into power on their professions of opposition to tyranny and extravagance here, then we see the real Democratic purpose disclosing itself, and that Congress passed bigger appropriation bills than had ever been passed in a time of peace. This bill is the largest sundry civil appropriation bill, omitting the appropriations for the Panama Canal, except one, that has ever been passed, and it is larger than that one if you omit also the appropriations for the rivers and harbors. So I say that this whole performance to-day is an exemplification of Democratic insincerity and an illustration of noble promises before election and base performance after election. Still I am inclined to think that after all it is wise for them to introduce it in this way.

I desire that they shall be economical. I believe that the chairman of the Appropriations Committee desires it, and I presume it is wise that they should bring it in under a rule not to allow their own party to get their hands on it. [Laughter.] If the Democratic majority of 64 in the last Congress passed a sundry civil bill of one hundred and sixteen millions, Heaven knows how big a bill a Democratic majority of 145 would pass. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

And so I am inclined to think that it is wise that the bill should come in in this way, that the new Members should not be allowed to put their finger in the pork barrel; that the committee places should be kept dangling before their eyes; and that they should be made to follow their leaders.

What will happen to it when it gets to the Democratic Senate where they probably will not have any such rule makes us tremble. So I should be content with this bill, believing that it is a better bill than this Democratic Congress would be apt to pass, if it was not for one clause in it. That is the clause upon which the President at the last session based his veto. That is the clause that provides that the appropriation for prosecutions under the Sherman law shall not be expended in suits brought against wage earners and farmers.

President Taft in his message disclosed the fundamental vice of such a provision. It is class legislation of the rankest and most vicious kind. It says that a penal statute, universal in its terms, shall not be enforced against certain classes in the community; and as if to make it worse, the classes which a body of officeholders elected by the suffrages of the people have selected to exempt from the operation of the statute are the two largest voting classes in the country. That shows the motive, the cowardice, the purpose of the provision. It shows that it is pandering to selfish prejudices, that it is a desire to cajole those two great classes and to advertise themselves as their especial friends.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that such legislation is vicious in itself; but when the classes exempted are those two most powerful classes, it shows a weak, base yielding to popular prejudice, a seeking for popular votes, which condemns the measure as much as the principle itself.

Of course, I understand that some excuse themselves by saying that, after all, there are other funds in the hands of the Attorney General which he can use, and that this does not absolutely prevent the enforcement of that statute. If that is so—and I suspect it is—it is no excuse for voting for this provision. It shows that it is hypocritical as well as vicious. It shows that it is a desire to humbug them as well as flatter them, and I do not believe that the intelligent, upright, thoughtful members of either of those two classes will be flattered and cajoled by any such transparent subserviency as that. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am against that clause, and I can not help hoping that the present Executive will also be opposed to it.

It was reported early in this session that this appropriation bill was to be introduced without that clause in deference to the wishes of the President, but it has not been omitted. I know nothing except newspaper reports, but the newspapers indicate that the President was very reticent upon that subject, and that he thought he had troubles enough of his own without taking up opposition to the House on that ground. I can not but believe that he sympathizes with his predecessor, President Taft, whether he has the same courage of his convictions or not. I believe President Wilson is a statesman of great intelligence and of high purpose, and that he can not approve a provision of such rank class legislation as this.

And, moreover, Mr. Speaker, there are some words of his which indicate his position. Let me read one sentence:

> We speak too exclusively of the capitalistic class. There is another as formidable an enemy to equality and freedom of opportunity as it, and that is the class formed by the labor organizations and leaders of the country—a class representing only a small minority of the laboring men of the country, quite as monopolistic in spirit as the capitalists and quite as apt to corrupt and ruin industries by their monopoly.

That is the language of Woodrow Wilson at the South Carolina dinner in New York in April, 1907. I have no reason to think he repudiates those opinions to-day. When the Republican administration was in power, when there was a Republican Attorney General, the Democratic Party did not think it necessary to pass such a limitation as this. They left Mr. Taft's and Mr. Wickersham's administration free. They did not tie their hands. But just as soon as they get an administration of their own, just as soon as they get a Democratic Attorney General, they limit his activities and they say his powers shall be limited by this qualification. I do not think the Democratic Attorney General deserves such treatment. A Republican administration was broad-minded enough to take him into their service years ago, and he proved by his efficiency then that he is worthy to be Attorney General and that he does not deserve this insult. I believe this Democratic administration, both because they do not wish this slur cast upon them and from the mere fundamental, unselfish, broad-minded reason that they recognize it as vicious legislation, must be opposed to it, and I trust that the same courage that President Taft exhibited will be shown by the present Executive. Be that as it may, Mr. Speaker, I shall move to recommit the bill, striking out this provision. [Applause on the Republican side.]

How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. Ten minutes.

Mr. GILLETT. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is recognized for five minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I voted against the rule for the consideration of this bill and the Indian appropriation bill because I believe the rule vicious, and I voted against it because in my opinion these bills, had they been considered under the ordinary rules of the House, would have been very considerably amended. I desire to call the attention of the new Members of the House to some items contained on pages 186, 187, 188, and 189 of the bill. On those pages we propose to appropriate approximately $5,000,000 for the fortification of the Panama Canal. This is the second considerable appropriation for that purpose, the former appropriations being, however, considerably less. This is the beginning of an expenditure which, at the very lowest estimate, will not be less than $50,000,000, and may reach $100,000,000. Col. Goethals has said that if we fortify the canal as these items suggest it will cost us $25,000,000 a year to support the troops that will be necessary to hold the canal, and he himself does not promise us that with this great outlay we could hold the canal any longer than for a short time against an expeditionary force sent by any great power against the canal. One hundred and fifty-four Members of this House I imagine have never read those items; at least they have never had the opportunity to pass upon them. When the bill was under consideration in the former Congress I attempted to move to recommit with instructions to strike out these items. Under the ruling of the Chair, because I was not opposed to the bill in toto, I was not allowed to make that motion. So I assume I shall not be allowed to make that motion to-day. Therefore, having tied our hands, having by rule provided that no amendment can be offered to the bill, and it being impossible to offer a motion to recommit unless the Member offering it states that he is opposed to the bill in toto, no amendment of the sort I have suggested or any amendment to any one item of the bill can be offered, either under the five-minute rule in the ordinary way, or on a motion to recommit. So gentlemen on the other side, large numbers of them, who have never read this bill, who at least have never had an opportunity to consider it, have by their action to-day so provided that it will be impossible for them to vote against this or any other of a considerable number of items in the bill that should be stricken out.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] voted to pass this bill over the President's veto, and I assume that while there might be some items in the bill with which he is not in accord, yet he favors the bill as a whole. It would be of little value to offer him opportunity to amend this bill in the House. He offered a great number of amendments to the bill in the last House, and none of them appealed to a majority of the Members present. As there was a Democratic majority of only 64 in the last House and there is a Democratic majority of 147 in this House, I can not understand how the gentleman could expect to be any more successful under these circumstances than he was when the majority was less.

Mr. MONDELL. Do I understand the gentleman to hold that the error increases with the increase of the Democratic majority?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; but when the gentleman was not even able to convince a number of his own party of the propriety or merit of his propositions, it is absolutely futile to attempt to convince a House with a majority of 147 Democrats against him.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the error could not have been very serious in the mind of the gentleman from Wyoming, else he would not have voted to pass the bill over the veto of the Republican President.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is quite apparent the gentleman could easily have recorded his opposition to the bill if there was some fundamental objection by refusing to vote to pass it over the President's veto.

Mr. MANN. Do I understand the gentleman takes the position that a Member can not vote for an appropriation bill because he is opposed to some items in it or because he desires to insert some other items?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. That seemed to be the position of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], acquiesced in by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no; but so long as his attempt to amend the bill was futile in the last House we all understand it would be a waste of time to repeat the performance now.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman assume that the new Members on that side are as blind as the old Members were?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, it was an unfortunate thing that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] could not have been present during the dying hours of the last Congress to have recorded himself against the passing of the bill over the President's veto, but I understand he was so overcome with grief at the passing out of power of the party to which he has been attached for so many years and under whose flag he has served in this House that he could not arrange to be here during the last half hour of the session and so was deprived of the opportunity of voting to sustain the veto of the President of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

But the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] labors under the same misapprehension as President Taft when he vetoed the bill. Nobody was surprised at President Taft demonstrating that he did not understand or know just what the provisions in the bill accomplished, although I must express great astonishment that so skilled and so careful and so shrewd a legislator as the gentleman from Massachusetts should fall into the same error as President Taft. President Taft in his message in veto makes this statement:

> At a time when there is widespread complaint of the high cost of living it certainly would be anomalous to put on the statute books of the United States an act in effect preventing the prosecution of combinations of producers of farm products for the purpose of artificially controlling prices; and the evil is not removed, although it may be masked, by referring to the purpose of the organization as "to obtain and maintain a fair and reasonable price for their products."

The most kindly characterization of the act of the President in sending such a statement as that to Congress is that he never read the provision which he criticized, but took some one's opinion as to just what it was, as he had done in connection with the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill when he said it was the best tariff bill ever enacted. The sundry civil bill and the legislative appropriation bill for the next fiscal year carry over $10,000,000 to defray expenses of court officers, officials, employees, and for expenses necessary in the prosecution of the legal business of the country. Six hundred thousand dollars is appropriated for the salaries of the United States district attorneys, $325,000 for the payment of regular assistants to United States district attorneys, $553,630 in the legislative bill for the force of the Attorney General in the Department of Justice, over $1,000,000 for witness fees, and a number of other items, all of which aggregate over $10,000,000, and all of this money is available for the purpose of prosecuting offenders against the Sherman antitrust law regardless of the class or category to which they apply with the exception of one single item of $300,000.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. If this clause did not prevent the Attorney General from such prosecution, may I ask what the purpose of this clause was?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am about to explain. I thought perhaps the gentleman from Massachusetts understood what had been done, although I am not surprised that the recent occupant of the White House did not understand or know what was going on in Congress. Some years ago there was a controversy in the House precipitated by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT]. He pointed out that a Republican administration, despite many protestations, was not doing anything to suppress the criminal combinations of capital which were oppressing the people in every direction, and he offered an amendment to the sundry civil appropriation bill appropriating $250,000 to relieve the administration of the excuse that it was hampered by a lack of funds for the prosecution of offenders against the Sherman antitrust law.

The spark that was struck by the gentleman from Georgia created such a conflagration that before the House finished, upon the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. LACEY, the appropriation was made $500,000. During the first two or three years following practically none of that money was expended by the administration, but later it commenced to employ distinguished lawyers and undertook the prosecution of certain litigation against certain industrial combinations that had been oppressing the people. Three or four years ago considerable agitation arose as a result of the so-called Danbury Hat case. Anyone who will examine the records of the Senate during the discussion of the Sherman antitrust law is aware of the fact that such men as Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts; Senator George, of Mississippi; and other distinguished lawyers expressed the opinion that the United States Supreme Court would never dream of construing the Sherman antitrust law as affecting either labor organizations or farmers' organizations. In the Danbury Hat case, as I recall, the Supreme Court referred to the records of Congress, and said that there was nothing to indicate that there was any intention ever to exclude organizations of either class, so that in the Sixty-first Congress—I am not sure whether it was three or four years ago—so that there might be no misunderstanding as to the specific purposes for which this particular fund had been made available, the so-called Hughes amendment, which many gentlemen who previously served in this House on that side have reason to recall with regret, was proposed in order to confine the employment out of this particular fund of attorneys to be employed in cases against industrial combinations. To the astonishment of everyone the administration itself took a very active part in attempting to defeat the amendment.

It passed the House and was stricken out in the Senate, and near the end of the session the House by a very close vote concurred in the Senate amendment. My recollection is that the vote showed a difference of about 10, which eliminated the amendment from the bill. I do not know whether the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] overlooked that fact when he stated that the Congress had never put any such restriction upon a Republican Attorney General. It was not because the attempt had not been made. And more than that, an attempt had been made at that time, because the attitude of the last Republican administration was such that there was grave reason to believe that it would have taken much more pleasure in prosecuting labor organizations and farmers' organizations than it would have taken in prosecuting the industrial combinations that had been so oppressive to the country.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not exactly understand the position of the gentleman from New York, and I would like to inquire whether he holds the antitrust law applies to the labor organizations in maintaining wages and strikes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think it does, now that the Supreme Court has so decided, but I think it was not so intended.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will say to the gentleman that the Supreme Court has not so decided.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In the Danbury Hat case—209 United States, I think it is—the Supreme Court has expressly held it and sustained the litigation brought under that act.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the gentleman will yield a little further, I will say that in my judgment the gentleman is entirely in error as to what the Supreme Court held in that case of which he is speaking. I have a copy of it right here, in which they say that the secondary boycott is illegal, whether conducted by a labor union or anyone else.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is what President Taft has insisted comes within the inhibition of the antitrust act, and in his message to Congress, sent here the last day of the last Congress, he says:

> An amendment almost in the language of this proviso, so far as it refers to organizations for the increasing of wages, etc., was introduced in the Sixty-first Congress, passed the House, was rejected in the Senate, and after a very full discussion in the House failed of enactment. Representative Madison, speaking in favor of the amendment which struck out the proviso, characterized it as an attempt "to write into the law, so far as this particular measure is concerned, a legalization of the secondary boycott." * * *

That is what the United States Supreme Court held in the Danbury Hat case, that because it was in effect a secondary boycott it came within the inhibition of the antitrust law. I do not think I misunderstand the effects of the decisions or the contentions of the gentlemen who have been objecting to this provision.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield a little further?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman either misunderstands me or intentionally perverts the language. There is a vast deal of difference in the secondary boycott and the other proposition.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The President contends that it authorized the secondary boycott, and that is the ground on which he vetoed the bill. There is no difference of opinion as to what his contention was as to the effect of the amendment.

Mr. Speaker, there is ample power and there are ample funds appropriated in this bill to permit the prosecution of offenders against every law, regardless of whom the offenders may be. I have no doubt that everybody can rest confident of the fact that under this administration all offenders against any law, regardless of class or person, will be proceeded against with impartially, although I may add that as the result of the Democratic Party controlling this administration there is less likelihood that there will be so many persons who will put themselves in a position where it will be necessary to invoke the aid of the criminal law. It is known that the same practices will not be tolerated now as have been prevalent heretofore during the many years of Republican misrule in this country.

Mr. Speaker, how much time have I used?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has used 16 minutes and has 4 minutes left.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to say just one word more, and that is that the only mistake that was made in this rule was in giving so much time for the discussion of the bill, because nobody—except the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT], with respect to this particular provision—has pointed out a single change desired in the bill, and also excepting the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], who made fruitless attempts to strike out the Panama Canal appropriations on several prior occasions.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] reserves four minutes.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman's last criticism is preposterous. To expect that anybody could in 20 minutes' time, or a portion of it, point out the defects and desired amendments in a bill containing hundreds and even thousands of items and appropriating $116,000,000 would be to expect the impossible. Of course, we can only have time to discuss one or two special points in the bill. And moreover, Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman's supercilious air of superiority toward President Taft will not injure President Taft and will not help the gentleman's case.

The gentleman's explanation does not explain. So far as I can gather from it, what he means is that this appropriation is a humbug and a piece of hypocrisy, and will amount to nothing, because there is other money available that can be used for the same purpose.

Very possibly that is the argument that put it into the bill. The gentleman from New York, to his credit, opposed this item when it was offered on the floor of the House and was ultimately defeated, and now apparently he accepts it and swallows it with the best grace he can.

Mr. Speaker, I yield half a minute to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] is recognized for one-half minute.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, when the sundry civil appropriation bill passed at the last session of the last Congress it carried an item of $500,000 for a Government exhibit at the Panama-Pacific International Exposition at San Francisco. The present bill carries a similar item.

Since that bill passed there has appeared an article in the newspapers throughout the country to the effect that the governor of California had objected to a State building on the ground that there was not enough money in the State treasury to warrant the appropriation for a State building. Since then I have received from the president of the exposition company a telegram asserting that the statement as published is entirely erroneous; that there will be a State building; and that the State of California will appropriate approximately $10,000,000 for the exposition, together with the $12,500,000 that the people of San Francisco have appropriated for that purpose, so that we shall have, approximately, from the people of California $22,500,000 for the exposition.

Nothing like that has ever been done before by any community or any State in furtherance of any exposition. I desire to read the telegram from the president of the exposition company. It is as follows:

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., April 10, 1913.

Hon. JULIUS KAHN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Report that California is not to have State building at Panama-Pacific Exposition is ridiculous. It arose from an editorial misconception of a published statement by Gov. Johnson. Circumstances were, the State has appropriated $5,000,000 for the exposition and also passed a bill permitting the various counties to levy a special tax for exposition purposes, which will amount to about $5,000,000, thus making contribution of the State between nine and ten million dollars, in addition to twelve and one-half million dollars from San Francisco. Representatives of some of the counties, acting independently of the exposition and without its active support, introduced a bill for further special appropriation from the State for California State building, in order to conserve the funds raised under their special tax. Gov. Johnson declined to indorse this proposition on the ground that the nine or ten million dollars from the State was sufficient. The statement referred solely to the proposed bill and was not intended to have any bearing whatever on the general question of a State building. He has issued a strong statement, which we are giving the press to-night, protesting against the distortion of his interview, in which he says:

"Reports that have been sent broadcast to the effect that the State has turned down the exposition or did not intend to exhibit are wholly without foundation. Our people, with a generosity unparalleled in history of expositions, have placed at the disposal of the Panama-Pacific Exposition $10,000,000, and in addition have empowered the counties to levy a tax of 6 cents on each hundred dollars of assessed valuation for exposition purposes. Of course out of these various sums an appropriate State building will be constructed."

Question was never as to whether a State building will be built, but only from what fund the money should be taken. There certainly will be a California building that will do credit to the State and to the Nation which she represents as hostess. The plans for this building have already been drawn.

CHARLES C. MOORE,
President Panama-Pacific International Exposition.

I make this statement to the House because quite a number of Members have spoken to me at various times since they saw the newspaper item to the effect that California would not have a State building, in order that their minds may be set at rest as to the attitude of California in the matter.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly; I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I do not wish to detract from the force of the gentleman's statement, and wish to say that the public spirit displayed by the citizens of San Francisco and California with respect to this exposition is highly commendable, more so than the spirit recently displayed toward a friendly nation. But he says that in the matter of expenditures the example of San Francisco or California had never been excelled or even equaled. I wish to say that St. Louis alone raised $22,000,000 for its exposition.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] one minute.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to be harshly critical of our friends on the other side touching their opposition to the adoption of the rule which brings this measure to immediate passage. This identical bill was before the House in February, in the last session. Then, when a rule was proposed to limit general debate on it to one hour, I antagonized its adoption and, upon a division, ascertained that not a Member on the Republican side supported me in an effort to get debate and consideration then. After the bill was for three days discussed under the five-minute rule I moved to recommit it with instructions to reduce the amount $11,000,000, and gentlemen on the Republican side, upon a division, voted unanimously against that proposition. When the labor amendment was up, offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HAMILL], and the farmers' amendment was up, offered by myself, gentlemen on that side had ample opportunity to support it or antagonize it if they desired. In addition to that, during the three days' consideration of the bill the House remained in session continuously from 10.30 o'clock in the morning until 11 o'clock at night. I opposed the procedure then and lost. Gentlemen who protest now stood mute then. At this time, seeking political gain and for political buncombe, statesmen on the Republican side seek to invoke Members on this side to antagonize a rule for the speedy passage of legislation that has had fairer consideration than the Republican régime was accustomed to give. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] now proposes by a motion to recommit to strike out the labor and farmer exemption provision vetoed by a Republican President, the most salutary piece of legislation in the bill, and which a Democratic President in a few days will have the pleasure of approving. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has three minutes remaining.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have differed with some of my colleagues in the past, and I differ with some of them now touching the desirability of certain legislation, but in that difference I have tried to keep a proper sense of proportion. In the closing hours of the last Congress I undertook to call attention to the fact that the President of the United States, if he vetoed the sundry civil bill, as the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. Cannon, said he would, because of the limitations placed on the special antitrust fund, would have lost that sense of proportion.

So far as I know, I was the first man in the Congress of the United States who opposed an amendment that undertook to change the substantive law of the land by exempting labor unions from the operation of that law. In the consideration of the penal code, when the codification of section 5508 was up, a penal section that dealt with conspiracies against the laws of the country, an amendment exempting labor unions was offered which I opposed and which was then voted down. I should not now vote for a bill that carried with it a provision changing the substantive law of the land so as to exempt any class from what I consider to be a general penal statute. But there is a world-wide difference between that position and the one which is presented in this bill. Here is a provision which, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has well said, was first offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] to furnish the Department of Justice with additional funds in order that they might not have any excuse for a failure to proceed against the great organizations of capital that were oppressing the people. Aside from any other consideration, it is perfectly proper to see to it that a fund so created in the first instance for that purpose shall be kept for that purpose and that purpose alone.

Believing, therefore, that the provision now in this bill did not affect the substantive law, that it was a limitation upon a particular fund for a given year, I said in my speech of the last session that I should support the bill, and I expect on this occasion to vote for the bill and to help to make it a law.

There is another reason for my present support of this bill. I do not think this House can consistently open up this bill as to a particular matter without opening it up as to all other matters. My justification for the rule that was passed a few moments ago, my justification for my position now in voting for the bill, is that it has received the proper consideration of Congress, that it received a vote of five out of six men in the House of Representatives at the last session, and that, therefore, knowing the need of the Government to have immediately available funds carried in the bill, it should not be delayed by a reconsideration.

Another word and I am through. I do not entirely agree with what has been recited touching the legislative history of the Sherman antitrust law. I shall not now undertake to discuss what was said at the time of the enactment of the Sherman antitrust law, and particularly what was said by Senator Edmunds, who, more than any one man, was responsible for the exact language; but I feel that I should say that I believe the full scope of the law was appreciated by Congress when it was enacted, and that scope properly embraced all conspiracies in restraint of trade.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired. All time has expired. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read the bill at length.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, April 22, 1913, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of Commerce, together with a memorandum relative to an authorization to enter into a lease for the rental of additional floor space for the Bureau of the Census and transfer of said bureau from its present quarters to the new building for the Department of Commerce (H. Doc. No. 34); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting schedule of useless executive documents (H. Doc. No. 35); to the Committee on Disposition of Useless Executive Papers and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. UNDERWOOD: A bill (H. R. 3321) to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. HAUGEN: A bill (H. R. 3322) to authorize the acquisition of a site and the erection thereon of a Federal building at Oelwein, Iowa; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, a bill (H. R. 3323) to authorize the acquisition of a site and the erection thereon of a Federal building at Osage, Iowa; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. DALE: A bill (H. R. 3324) to increase the pension of widows, minor children, etc., of deceased soldiers and sailors of the late Civil War, the War with Mexico, the various Indian wars, etc., and to grant a pension to certain widows of the deceased soldiers and sailors of the late Civil War; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 22, 1913.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We thank Thee, our Father in heaven, for the spirit which came into the world nineteen hundred years ago, heralded by the angelic host, praising God and saying, "Glory to God in the highest and on earth peace, good will toward men;" that the chorus has been growing in volume and intensity down through the ages; that God lives and reigns in the hearts of men to-day with greater potency than ever before in the history of the world; that love is in the ascendancy and truth is marching on. Grant, O most merciful Father, that it may so continue until the Christ spirit shall possess all hearts; that Thy kingdom may come and Thy will be done in earth as it is done in heaven, to the glory and honor of Thy holy name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER.

Mr. ANSBERRY appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office.

THE TARIFF.

By direction of the Committee on Ways and Means, Mr. UNDERWOOD reported back, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 3321) to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time and, with the accompanying report (No. 5), referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present the views of the minority on that bill and ask that they be printed with the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] presents the views of the minority and asks unanimous consent that they be printed with the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to file other minority views within four days.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to file within four days other minority views. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that there may be an additional number of the report on this bill printed to the cost of $500, which I believe is the limitation on the printing, and that 500 of the copies may go to the Committee on Ways and Means, the remainder to go to Members through the folding room.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama intend to embrace within that request the two minority views?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will ask if that request will include the printing of the views of the minority with the report?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It will, because the views of the minority as presented by the gentleman will go in as a part of the report.

Mr. LANGLEY. That will not include the minority views to be filed later by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK]?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; the gentleman from Kansas, when he presents his views, will have to make his own request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that a number of copies of the majority report, together with the minority views filed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], not to exceed $500 in cost, be printed.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. MURDOCK. Would it be practicable for us to include our minority views with the majority report and the other minority views?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think so, because the House expects to take up this bill to-morrow morning.

Mr. MURDOCK. And it is to be immediately printed?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We desire to have it printed at once.

Mr. MURDOCK. It will go to the printer to-day?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It will go to the printer now. In fact, the printer already has a copy.

The SPEAKER. Let the Chair understand the situation. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Kansas to give his attention. If the gentleman's views are filed in time to be printed with the report and views of the minority filed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], then they will be printed with the report. Is that the understanding?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, that is impossible. This will go to the printer within an hour and the gentleman desires four days.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire now to submit another request for unanimous consent. On yesterday the House ordered printed 10,000 copies of the tariff bill. The printer has informed me that he was able to print only 5,400 of them under the limitation of cost prescribed in the law. In order that the House may have the full number that was ordered yesterday, I ask unanimous consent that there may be an additional 4,500 copies of the bill, H. R. 3321, printed, to be distributed as ordered yesterday.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to suggest to the gentleman may he not find he will have the same trouble about the report under the $500 limit to which he has just referred, that it will not give enough reports?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then I will have to ask another order. I will either have to do that or get a concurrent resolution through the two Houses, and I thought this was the easiest way to accomplish it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Why does not the gentleman do that now?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can not make two orders the same day.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. That is of the bill as reported now. Make it 5,000 copies of the bill as reported.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will amend it in that respect. I ask unanimous consent that the motion may be 5,000 copies of the bill as reported be now printed, to be distributed in accordance with the order made yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that 5,000 copies of the tariff bill be printed under the conditions made yesterday.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman will have to make conditions now, because there will be a new order against the printer. Does the gentleman desire now those 5,000 copies to go to the folding room?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I said in accordance with the order of yesterday, that 2,000 copies of the print go to the committee and 2,000 to the document room and the balance to the folding room.

Mr. MANN. That is just the point. There will be two different prints, slightly different, one of the bill as reported and one as introduced.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have arranged already with the Public Printer; he will print this as the reported bill on the order of yesterday. I thought there would be no objection.

Mr. HAMMOND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. HAMMOND. How many of these reports will go to the folding room?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. They will all go to the folding room except 500 copies to the committee.

Mr. HAMMOND. And will be there apportioned among the Members?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. There ought to be some extra number go to the document room, because they are constantly having requests for them.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will modify my request, Mr. Speaker, that 500 copies of the report go to the committee, 500 to the document room, and the balance to the folding room, to be distributed to the Members.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that 5,000 copies of the bill be printed, that 500 copies go to the Committee on Ways and Means——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I think that order has been agreed to. The request I make is in reference to the report and it is that it may be printed, and that $500 be the limit of cost and that 500 copies of the report may go to the committee.

Mr. MANN. The printing of the report was agreed to. The gentleman asked for 5,000 copies of the reported bill to be printed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I thought that had been agreed to.

Mr. MANN. It has not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not believe it was ever agreed to; but, if so, it will not hurt to agree to it again. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to print 5,000 copies of the tariff bill, 500 copies to go to the Committee on Ways and Means, 500 to the document room, and the rest to the folding room. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I believe the order in reference to the printing of the report has been already agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it has.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman from Alabama takes his seat I would like to ask a question. I understand he intends to call up this bill to-morrow. I will ask him if he has any suggestion to make now as to the length of general debate or order of it?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I would be glad if the gentleman has a suggestion to agree on the time of debate now if he wishes to do so.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, I simply wanted to get at the mind of the gentleman from Alabama on the subject more than anything else.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state to the gentleman that I would like to start to-morrow morning with the consideration of the bill under general debate and let the debate run, say, five days, having night sessions, and at the end of that time to close general debate and take up the reading of the bill.

Mr. PAYNE. Has the gentleman any suggestion to make as to the division of the time, whether it is to be controlled by members of the committee or whether it is to be controlled by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union? I have no special preference for either proposition.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would prefer that the Chairman would control the time.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, my recollection of the practice is that before the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, unanimous consent is asked for an arrangement of time between the two opposing sides. That is the general practice, is it not?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. If unanimous consent is refused, then when the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, it is within the province of the Chair to recognize anyone whom he pleases?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is.

Mr. MURDOCK. For an hour's time in each instance. Is that the case?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. With certain limitations.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman desires to do so, I will ask unanimous consent that debate on this bill shall be limited to five legislative days, commencing to-morrow.

Mr. MURDOCK. Now, Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know if I could make an arrangement with the majority leader and with the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], of the minority, as to what time I am to have?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman that the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole controls the time. He will divide it as customary, and divide it between the two sides of the House. I have no doubt that he will recognize the gentleman from Kansas and his party for their fair share of the minority time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is about 5 per cent.

Mr. FORDNEY. If the gentleman will permit, in the division of that time it is about 1 to 7, and so the time allowed to the gentleman and his friends should not be more than that proportion.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that should be an inflexible rule.

Mr. LANGLEY. That is assuming they are of equal weight.

Mr. MURDOCK. I do not think that should be the rule as to allotment of time for general debate in the House. There has been a lot of latitude based on the demand for time. It may be, I will say to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], we may not need all the time he allots to us, but I do not think it fair to put it on a mathematical basis.

Mr. FORDNEY. I think it would. There are about 140 Members on this side of the House——

Mr. PAYNE. I understand the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] proposes to leave the recognition entirely with the Chairman and not divide the time, so that I think this discussion is rather premature, and I do not see the object of limiting the debate just now.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no particular desire to limit the debate now, because I recognize the fact that when the bill has been considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, it is in the power of the House to close debate any time it desires to do so. I will say that my purpose is to let the debate run about five days.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. MANN. The Republican Members of the House desire to have a conference in the Hall of the House on Thursday evening, and in any arrangement that is made, by rule or otherwise, on the subject, I hope that will be taken into consideration.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that I am always glad to accommodate the minority in any way we can. As I wish to close this debate, and wish to have, generally, night sessions from now on until the close of the time, I hope the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will find it convenient to arrange a different time for that meeting.

Mr. MANN. There is no way of arranging for a different time for the meeting if the House is to be in session from 12 o'clock noon every day. We can not very well have a conference before 12 o'clock. We have not made any complaint about the delay in the consideration of this bill in the Democratic caucus, and I think the gentleman will desire, in fairness to the minority, to permit them to have the use of the Hall of the House on Thursday evening without subjecting them to be in attendance in the House that night. I would suggest to the gentleman to give a little longer time for debate, leaving out that night. I hope the gentleman will agree as to a division of time, and I am sure the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] ought to be able to agree between themselves as to the control of the time on the minority side.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that, of course, it is customary in the House to divide the time equally between the minority and the majority.

Mr. MANN. I understand that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And I am not complaining about that. Of course, the minority in this House has only one-third of the membership—that is, both minorities put together—and therefore two-thirds of the House will only have half of the time. Now, as to the division of the time that goes to the minority, which will probably be half of all the time, I think the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Kansas ought to work out their own division.

Mr. MANN. I think they ought to be able to agree.

Mr. MURDOCK. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] I will be glad to agree, for this reason: I think if you put this proposition in the hands of the presiding officer, that when he recognizes a man in the Committee of the Whole he will recognize him for an hour. That is liable to let a few men monopolize this debate, because the natural tendency of a man in making a tariff speech is to extend his remarks.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state to the gentleman that the Chair has always controlled the time in that respect in the past.

Mr. MURDOCK. Can he recognize a man for less than an hour?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think so.

Mr. MURDOCK. I will be glad to arrange with the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] as to a division of time.

Mr. MANN. That can be arranged to-morrow morning.

Mr. MURDOCK. Then I suggest that the matter go over until to-morrow morning.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am perfectly willing that it should go over until to-morrow morning, but I would like to close the debate in five days, with night sessions. I will ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], Would it be convenient for him to have his caucus on Wednesday, instead of Thursday, or does he desire to have it on Thursday?

Mr. MANN. I think it would not be convenient.

DAILY HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If it is desired, we can take a recess until half past 7 on that day. Now, Mr. Speaker, we can determine about the time to-morrow morning. I ask unanimous consent that the daily hour of meeting of the House shall be changed from 12 o'clock noon to 11 o'clock a. m. until otherwise ordered by the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the hour of meeting of the House be changed from 12 o'clock noon to 11 o'clock a. m. until otherwise ordered. Is there objection?

Mr. MURDOCK. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, is it the purpose of the gentleman, in holding night sessions, to hold them late, or not?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can not determine that until we get into it.

Mr. MURDOCK. That means, under the gentleman's request, that we shall meet at 11 o'clock and continue in session until 5 o'clock, and then begin a night session at 8 o'clock?

Mr. MANN. Let it run from 11 to 11. We have nothing else to do. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the country expects us to pass this bill as speedily as we can, in justice to the membership of this House. There are no other committees appointed, and no other work to do, and I see no reason why we should not start at 11 o'clock in the morning and run until a reasonable hour at night. The will of the House can determine that.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman modify that request and instead of commencing at 11 o'clock to-morrow make it begin on Thursday?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], I will ask unanimous consent that after to-morrow the daily hour of meeting shall be 11 o'clock a. m. instead of 12 o'clock noon until otherwise ordered by the House; that is, commencing Thursday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that after to-morrow the hour of meeting of the House be 11 o'clock a. m. instead of 12 o'clock m. until further ordered. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY DIRECT VOTE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has an official communication from the proper authorities of the State of South Dakota, announcing the ratification of the seventeenth amendment to the Constitution, with respect to the election of United States Senators by popular vote, and will place it among the archives of the House.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. When the House adjourned yesterday the previous question had been ordered upon the bill making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government, of which the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2441) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I move that this bill be recommitted, with instructions to report it back forthwith to the House, omitting the language on page 129 beginning with the word "Provided," on line 13, to the bottom of the page.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

By Mr. GILLETT. I move to recommit, with instructions to the committee to report the bill back forthwith, amended by striking out all of page 129 after the figures "$300,000," constituting the proviso.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the matter that is proposed to be stricken out.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, however, That no part of this money shall be spent in the prosecution of any organization or individual for entering into any combination or agreement having in view the increasing of wages, shortening of hours or bettering the conditions of labor, or for any act done in furtherance thereof, not in itself unlawful: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the prosecution of producers of farm products and associations of farmers who cooperate and organize in an effort to and for the purpose to obtain and maintain a fair and reasonable price for their products.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the previous question.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] demands the previous question.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTLETT. In case this motion should prevail and there were instructions to the Committee on Appropriations to report forthwith an amendment striking out this provision, how could that be accomplished when there is no Committee on Appropriations in existence?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I submit that the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] was to recommit this bill to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, which exists, with directions to that committee to report it back.

Mr. BARTLETT. But that was not his motion as I understood it.

Mr. MANN. He did not so state, but that is the only committee to which it could be referred.

Mr. BARTLETT. The parliamentary inquiry was made for the purpose of determining that, to know how we would be situated if this motion should prevail.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has relieved the Speaker of the duty of stating the case. Of course this came from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No, Mr. Speaker, it did not.

The SPEAKER. Practically it did.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Practically not, because there was no Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to make the report of it.

The SPEAKER. This bill was considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, and if this motion should prevail, the Chair would make this report, because that is the only way out of it.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I purposely omitted mentioning any committee. I simply followed the exact language of the rule.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman did not mention the committee, the Chair will rule his motion out of order.

Mr. GILLETT. Then, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make another motion. I omitted it for that express purpose, so that if the point should be raised it might be decided. Now, if the Speaker rules my motion out of order I wish to make another motion.

Mr. BARTLETT. I did not make any point of order. I made a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not going to rule on a point of order that is not made.

Mr. BARTLETT. All I wanted was information.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question on this motion.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken, and pending the announcement of the result,

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. To request the yeas and nays on this motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] demands the yeas and nays. All those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Thirteen Members, not a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are refused.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks for a division.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. On what motion?

The SPEAKER. On the motion to recommit.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 47, noes 198.

Accordingly the motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question being taken, the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. FITZGERALD, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Indian appropriation bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (H. R. 1917) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914.

The SPEAKER. On this bill there are 40 minutes' debate under the rule adopted yesterday, and the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Texas yield?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman agreed upon a division of time?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. We have not. I suppose there will be 20 minutes on a side, under the rule.

Mr. MANN. Will not the gentleman from Texas yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE]?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Certainly; I will yield to him the control of the time on that side, and if the gentleman desires to make a statement first, I have no objection.

Mr. MANN. You yield him 20 minutes' time?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I yield him 20 minutes' time. I reserve my time. Does the gentleman from South Dakota desire to use a part of his time now? If not, I will make a general statement.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I would prefer that the gentleman from Texas make his statement now.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the bill under consideration is the annual Indian appropriation bill. It is for the purpose of paying the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914.

Last year we had extensive hearings before the Committee on Indian Affairs on the bill, and those hearings are in print and are in the room of the Committee on Indian Affairs of this House. When the bill passed the House it carried appropriations aggregating $8,262,000 in round numbers. The Senate, after consideration of the bill, added $5,488,594 to the House appropriations, making the bill as it passed the Senate total $13,750,594. That increase was covered by 131 Senate amendments. The conference committee of the two Houses on the bill reduced that amount by $3,672,317, leaving the bill so that it carried one million and a few hundred thousand dollars above the amount that the bill carried when it passed the House.

The bill agreed upon in conference and reported back to the two Houses amounted to $10,079,205. This is the exact amount carried in this bill.

The conference report, under the rules, should first have been approved by the Senate. The bill had passed the House, and every item in it had been well considered and was satisfactory to the House. The Senate added, as I have stated, over $5,000,000, and in conference we cut nearly four millions of that amount from the bill. The Senate refused to agree to the conference report of the two Houses on the bill. There was in the bill an appropriation of $100,000 for the purpose of removing from Oklahoma to New Mexico the Apache Band of Indians, known as the Geronimo Band, that went on the warpath more than 25 years ago. These Indians were captured by the Army and held as prisoners at Fort Sill, Okla.

Two years ago Congress passed a bill providing that they should be released as prisoners of war and removed to the reservation from which they came in New Mexico, and Congress provided that if they should not desire to return to New Mexico that Congress should buy land for them in Oklahoma. This bill carried a provision for $100,000 for the purpose of purchasing this land in Oklahoma for those that remained in that State. One of the Senators from the State of New Mexico, taking advantage of the fact that there was no closure rule in that body, in the common parlance of the two Houses, talked our bill to death. It failed to pass for that alleged reason only.

This is the identical bill that I have presented here to-day, and it contains the same items and is based upon the mass of facts that we procured after extensive hearings, as I have already stated to the House.

The Committee on Rules has reported this bill to this House in the same terms and amounts that were agreed upon by the conference committee of the two Houses. The only objection urged to the bill in the Senate was the objection to the return of the Apache Indians to New Mexico. I understand that most of these Indians have been already transferred to New Mexico, and hence there is no reason for expending all of the $100,000 in Oklahoma, but the unexpended balance will be turned back into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will.

Mr. COOPER. Was not there a similar bill which contained a provision for the sale of the Hot Springs National Park in Oklahoma?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That item was eliminated and is not in this bill. It was in the sundry civil bill and not in this bill. I know it is not in this bill at the present time.

Now, Mr. Speaker, unless some gentleman desires to ask a question, I will reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is necessary to take up the time of the House in discussing this bill. As stated by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS], who was the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs when this bill was considered, the bill was carefully considered and prepared in the last session of the last Congress, passed the Senate, went to conference, and the conferees agreed upon the bill in the form in which it is now before the House; and while there may be some provisions in the bill that personally I would like to see changed, it was my opinion, under the circumstances, that it would be very much better for the bill to be introduced in the form in which it was agreed to in conference and passed, rather than to attempt any amendments. Therefore I hope the bill will pass.

I yield half a minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. J. I. NOLAN].

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have published in the RECORD a copy of a resolution adopted by the board of supervisors of the city of San Francisco upon the subject of Government ownership of telegraph and telephone companies.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution is as follows:

FEDERAL TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH SYSTEM.

CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO,
BOARD OF SUPERVISORS, CLERK'S OFFICE,
April 15, 1913.

Hon. JOHN I. NOLAN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your attention is respectfully called to the attached resolution adopted by the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco.

Yours, very truly,

J. S. DUNNIGAN, Clerk.

Federal telephone and telegraph system. On motion of Supervisor Vogelsang: Resolution No. 10114 (new series), as follows:

Whereas the telegraph and telephone are daily becoming more necessary to the comfort and convenience of all the people; and

Whereas in its original grant of franchise to the Western Union Telegraph Co. the Government of the United States reserved the right to acquire the same; and

Whereas Government ownership and control of the means of transmission of electric messages and communications is as logical and necessary as its monopoly of transmission of written or printed matter: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Board of Supervisors of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, That in the judgment of this board the present is the time for the acquisition of these utilities by the Government of the United States and that the Congress be urged to take such steps as may be necessary for the acquisition and establishment of a Federal telegraph and telephone system, rendering a local intrastate and interstate postal service. Be it further

Resolved, That the clerk of this board transmit copies of this resolution to the Senate and House of Representatives and to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from California.

Adopted—Board of Supervisors, San Francisco, April 14, 1913.

Ayes: Supervisors Bancroft, Caglieri, A. J. Gallagher, G. E. Gallagher, Giannini, Hayden, Hilmer, Hocks, Jennings, Koshland, Mauzy, McCarthy, McLeran, Murdock, Murphy, Nolan, Payot, Vogelsang.

Approved, San Francisco, April 15, 1913.

J. S. DUNNIGAN, Clerk.
JAMES ROLPH, Jr., Mayor.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the bill now before the House was very carefully considered by the last Congress, and I think that in the main its provisions are wise and proper. I think it is unfortunate that the new Members of the House have not had an opportunity to examine the bill and to offer amendments to it; but inasmuch as that is not possible under the rule that has been adopted, I am glad to give my assurance—whatever weight that may have—that the bill did have careful consideration, was carefully drafted, and in the main it is a very satisfactory Indian bill.

I take advantage of the opportunity offered me, Mr. Speaker, to ask permission to insert in the RECORD two memorials adopted by the Legislature of the State of Wyoming, recently in session, addressed to Congress, one relating to the administration of the land laws generally and particularly to the activities of special agents, and another relating to the administration of the laws relative to the repayment of moneys paid on land proofs and entries. Following the first of those petitions, I desire to insert an editorial from the Washington Post under the caption "Wyoming's protest," and, following the second resolution, another editorial from the same paper under the title "Bureaucracy hard hit."

These resolutions of the Wyoming Legislature recite briefly some of the grievances of western communities relative to certain policies which have been pursued by the Interior Department in relation to the public lands. We out there are still of the opinion that the Interior Department ought to be bound by the law; that it ought to follow the law; that it is the duty of the administrative officers of that department to give to American citizens seeking locations on the public lands, seeking to use and acquire the public lands, the rights and privileges that Congress has in its wisdom granted them. We believe that in the past the administration of the land laws has not in all instances been in accordance with the letter or the spirit of the statutes. We believe men have been denied rights which the law gives them. We believe that there has been a policy prevalent in the department which has been held to be superior to the statutes. All we ask is that the Interior Department in administering the land laws shall administer them according to their spirit and intent, granting no more than the law contemplates, withholding nothing that the law grants.

This Democratic administration has a splendid opportunity through its Secretary of the Interior to increase the respect, or rather to win back the respect, of the western people for the administration of the law so far as it relates to public land.

Mr. Speaker, I for one will be entirely free and frank in giving the administration credit if it shall attempt to administer the laws according to their letter, spirit, and intent, rather than in accordance with a theory contrary thereto, and I shall be quite as free as I have been in the past to criticize if in the administration of the land laws those who are seeking homes on the public domain, those who are endeavoring to develop the resources of that western land, are discouraged, hampered, and thwarted in their efforts to exercise the rights and privileges which the laws grant.

The memorial of the Legislature of Wyoming, relative to the administration of the public-land laws, is as follows:

TWELFTH LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF WYOMING.

Enrolled joint memorial 1, House of Representatives, State of Wyoming.

Memorial to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States relative to the administration of the public land laws:

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Wyoming (the Senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States be memorialized as follows:

Whereas the State of Wyoming has been and is being discriminated against by the unjustifiable rulings of the Department of the Interior in the administration of the land laws; and

Whereas the Department of the Interior has particularly discriminated against this State in the rulings it has made concerning irrigation projects under the Carey Act, thereby retarding the development of the State; and

Whereas the major portion of the special agents of the department are men from the extreme East and not familiar with conditions in the West; and

Whereas these same special agents act more as persecutors of settlers than prosecutors of fraudulent entries; and

Whereas the rules and regulations laid down by the Forestry Department have become so burdensome and costly that it has and is forcing men and companies out of business and depriving many of our local men of employment: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we protest against the administration of the land laws which prevents the irrigation, reclamation, and settlement of our public lands.

That we favor an enlarged and additional homestead law.

That, if we must have special agents, that they be western men, familiar with conditions.

That we demand that the regulations relative to the cutting of timber for local use be altered so that residents may secure timber and lumber at reasonable instead of prohibitive prices.

The editorial of the Washington Post to which I have referred is as follows:

WYOMING'S PROTEST.

The joint resolution from the Wyoming Legislature, demanding relief from arbitrary and unfair enforcement of the land laws by special agents of the Interior Department, and presented to the United States Senate, will appeal to the conservationists as an outcropping of an old heresy.

It is a curious thing about the so-called conservationists that violations of law mean little to them when done in the name of conservation.

There is only one way to enforce any law, and that is with equal justice to all. But this kind of justice, if extended to the citizens of Alaska, who are now paying $14 a ton for coal from Canada when they might be mining their own, or to the prospectors of the West, or the manufacturers of the South who want water power, would provoke from the conservationists an expression of deep resentment.

Yet, why should not the laws of the land be regarded by the conservationists as well as by other citizens? Why should capital be deprived of the right of investing in American enterprises in the South, in Wyoming, or in Alaska? Why should a fetich created by a few fanatics be permitted to halt the development of the United States?

The States have never deeded to the Federal Government their control of streams within their borders. The riparian owners have not deeded their rights to the Secretary of War. The Wyoming Legislature vigorously protests against the unjust enforcement of arbitrary rules of the Interior Department, and asks Congress to see to it that the servants of the public do not put themselves up as masters.

The law should be obeyed by all citizens, even including the officers of the United States Government. The natural resources of the country should be conserved, but so should the laws. President-elect Wilson will show his common sense if he insists on the enforcement of the conservation laws so that the interests of the people, rather than the conceit of a few censors, shall be conserved.

The other resolution to which I have referred is as follows:

TWELFTH LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF WYOMING.

Enrolled joint resolution 3, House of Representatives, State of Wyoming.

A joint resolution relating to the refunding of certain moneys now lying in the Treasury of the United States, being paid therein by certain citizens of the United States in attempting to make final proofs on the public domain, and memorializing the Congress of the United States to pass such legislation as may be necessary for the refunding of these moneys to those who have so paid them into the Treasury of the United States and thereby relieving the distress caused to certain citizens of the United States by both denying patent on public lands for different causes and then retaining the money paid, as provided by law, preliminary to perfecting such proofs.

Be it resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring):

Whereas certain citizens of the United States have filed on portions of the public domain, pursuant to the several acts of the Congress of the United States providing for the filing on and for the making of final proof and the securing of patent on the said public domain of the United States, so set apart for such purposes; and

Whereas these citizens, in attempting to make final proof, previous to perfecting patents on the public domain filed on under the several acts of Congress providing for the securing of patents on the public domain, to wit: Under the homestead act, the stone and timber act, the desert-land act and the coal-land act have been unsuccessful and for one cause or another have been denied patent; and

Whereas these citizens have paid different sums of money into the Treasury of the United States, previous to their attempts to make final proofs, as provided by the acts of the Congress of the United States, and which proofs were unsuccessful and patents were denied; and

Whereas these moneys have never been refunded to the citizens who have so paid them into the Treasury of the United States previous to their unsuccessful attempts to make final proofs; and

Whereas both the failure to secure title to the lands on which these attempts to make final proofs were made, and the loss of the moneys so paid into the Treasury of the United States have wrought untold hardship and loss to these citizens: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Legislature of the State of Wyoming, That the Congress of the United States be, and is hereby, memorialized and requested to enact such legislation as may be necessary for the refunding of these moneys so paid into the Treasury of the United States to the citizens so paying them in and thus relieve the hardship and loss which the withholding of these moneys is causing these citizens; be it further

Resolved, That engrossed copies of this memorial and request be sent to the President of the United States, the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and the Secretary of the Interior, asking their aid in bringing the object of this memorial and request before Congress and in securing from same adequate legislation for the purpose herein set forth; and be it further

Resolved, That engrossed copies of this memorial and request be sent to the Senators from Wyoming in the Congress of the United States, viz, Hon. CLARENCE D. CLARK and FRANCIS E. WARREN, and our Representative in said Congress, Hon. FRANK W. MONDELL, asking them to use their best efforts to secure a favorable action upon the request embodied herein.

Repeated protests that the present practice of the Interior Department in the matter of repayment having failed to secure favorable action on various applications for repayments, I recently introduced a resolution of inquiry relative to the present status of such applications, as follows:

Resolution.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby requested to furnish the House of Representatives a list of all applications for payment of money paid on public-land applications, selections, entries, and proofs which have been pending in the Interior Department over three months, with character of application, selection, entry, or proof, name of land district, of applicant, and amount involved.

The following editorial from the Washington Post of recent date, while it does not bear directly on the matters referred to, does point out the evils which lie at the bottom of most of the troubles which those who dare the hardships of the frontier to establish homes and develop resources encounter in their dealings with the Interior Department, to wit, the policy of following what the bureaus hold should be the law rather than the law itself. It may seem strange beyond belief to some people that under our form of government it is necessary to appeal to the bureaus whose duty it is to administer the laws to grant our citizens the rights and opportunities the law contemplates they shall have, yet such is the case. The Post editorial is as follows:

BUREAUCRACY HARD HIT.

The verdict of acquittal in the Alaska coal lands conspiracy case is not only "a most extraordinary victory for counsel for the defense," so characterized by Judge Kenesaw M. Landis from the bench, but it is a famous victory for popular rights and sound public policy over bureaucratic methods of government. The result of the trial breaks the grip of conservation run mad and comes at a most opportune time for the new administration, affording, as it does, a splendid opening for the party in power to show its hand in conformity with the plank in the Baltimore platform promising a return to a more rational and businesslike policy in exercising authority over the public domain. Here is a great chance for Democracy to demonstrate its readiness to employ the implements of construction as well as the pruning knife. The verdict nullifies the pretext for withdrawing the Alaskan coal fields from entry, but the formal order which closed the door of opportunity continues in force. And back of that formal order, which of itself offers no stumbling block to reform, are the intrenched forces of bureaucracy, occupying a vantage ground from which they have for years successfully operated—thwarting the efforts of Congress to liberalize the land laws on one side, and on the other exercising legislative, executive, and judicial powers of their own contriving, with the disguised but settled purpose to make the path of the homesteader and prospector too thorny to travel.

This monopoly of defiance and oppression in restraint of human rights and national development has been kept in office by pressure of misdirected public sentiment and executive tolerance. Thus fortified, these promoters of bureaucracy have made and unmade cabinets, written party platforms, packed juries, suborned witnesses, falsified the records—all in the name of conservation. To-day, however, the truth is known. The revelations of the past year have opened the eyes of the people, cost the clique the support of the press, and kicked some props from under their last stronghold. As a finishing blow to the sinister policy that has worked so evilly in Alaska and 10 Northwestern States, perhaps the course of action urged by the Portland Oregonian offers the best suggestion. "In order that justice be done," remarks the Oregonian, the service "should be overhauled, its entire practice revised, and the men who, through long habit are mentally incapable of dealing out justice should be displaced. We look to President Wilson and Secretary Lane to initiate these reforms and put an end to the arbitrary star-chamber methods which now prevail."

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to discuss this matter further, and unless there is some gentleman on this side who desires some time I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I call for the reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read the bill.

During the reading of the bill,

The SPEAKER. At the bottom of page 39, in the last line, line 25, the word "who" ought to be "whose."

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it be changed accordingly.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to change the word "who" to the word "whose" in line 25, page 39. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. STEPHENS of Texas, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. RODDENBERY, indefinitely, on account of illness.

To Mr. L'ENGLE, for the remainder of the week, on account of illness.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to ask unanimous consent to have a resolution which I introduced—resolution No. 40—changed from the Committee on Agriculture, there being no such committee, to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. What is the resolution about?

Mr. FOWLER. The resolution is only a resolution of inquiry.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the resolution?

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the gentleman if it is a resolution of inquiry he can call it up, notwithstanding the fact that there is no committee appointed.

Mr. FOWLER. The resolution requests the Secretary of Agriculture to give certain information relative to the Weather Bureau. It goes no further than to ask or request information.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on Agriculture from the consideration of the resolution named and refer it to the Committee on Rules. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

PRINTING OF REPORT ON TARIFF BILL.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I am informed that the record does not show that the request I made this morning about the printing of the report on the tariff bill had been agreed to. I want to renew the request—that is, that there may be a number of copies of the report printed, up to the $500 limitation of law; that 500 copies of that report shall go to the Ways and Means Committee, 500 to the document room, and the balance to be distributed to Members through the folding room.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that there shall be printed a number of copies of the report of the Committee on Ways and Means, together with the report of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] setting forth the views of the minority, not to exceed the cost of $500; 500 copies to go to the Committee on Ways and Means, 500 to the document room, and the rest to the folding room.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield for an inquiry?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman inform the House how many copies can be printed for $500?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can not, because I do not know. I do not think there will be as many as the House needs, and I will have to ask a little later on, perhaps to-morrow or the next day, for an additional number.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman thinks there will be a sufficient number for the Members to have at least one?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, yes.

Mr. MANN. This request is for a number in addition to the usual number?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HULINGS. I rise for the purpose of inquiring whether the motion of the gentleman from Alabama comprehends the printing of the minority report to be presented by the Progressive Party?

The SPEAKER. That can not be done to-morrow, because the report will not be ready to-morrow.

Mr. HULINGS. Well, when it is done.

The SPEAKER. There will be no trouble about that.

Mr. MANN. It will be printed as a matter of course when it is presented.

The SPEAKER. There will be no trouble about that. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that there shall be printed a number of copies of the report filed by himself for the majority of the Ways and Means Committee, together with the report filed by Mr. PAYNE, of New York, for a portion of the minority, not to exceed $500 in cost; 500 of those reports to go to the Committee on Ways and Means, 500 to the document room, and the rest to the folding room. Is there objection.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. LAFFERTY. Reserving the right to object—to ask if the gentleman from Alabama will amend his request to include the report of Mr. MURDOCK if filed to-day?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my request. I have made it plain to the membership of the House in answer to the question several times——

Mr. LAFFERTY. This report will probably be filed to-day, and if filed to-day, is there any objection to its being printed?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not at all.

Mr. MANN. If filed to-day, it will go, necessarily, with the report.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is no possibility of its being filed to-day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LAFFERTY. I object.

The SPEAKER. The agreement is that it be filed to-day.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Very well; I do not object.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman just stated that he did.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 22 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, April 23, 1913, at 12 o'clock m.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 23, 1913.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Rev. William Couden, of Norwalk, Ohio, offered the following prayer:

We thank Thee, Almighty Father, for the rest of the night and the strength of the day. By such unfailing mercies do we know that we are dependent on Thee. Without Thee we can do nothing. Let us willingly put our moral and spiritual natures also in Thy care. Through our weaknesses and our aspirations, our ideals and our needs, keep us in close contact with Thee. Bless this assembly and all its Members. Endue these, Thy servants, with righteousness, that Thy people may be joyful. We ask it in Jesus' name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. EDWARDS, indefinitely, on account of illness.

To Mr. ASHBROOK, for one week, on account of death of brother.

SWEARING IN A MEMBER.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office.

MAINTENANCE OF ORDER.

The SPEAKER. When the present occupant of the chair was sworn in at the beginning of this Congress he invited the aid and cooperation of all the Members in maintaining order, and while nobody is now doing anything out of order, yet the Chair wishes to make a suggestion or two, not a lecture.

It has been brought to the attention of the Chair by several Members that there has been an unconscious violation of the rules. The rule is that there shall be no smoking in this Chamber. So far as the Chair is aware, that rule has not been violated outright, but what a good many of the Members complain of is that gentlemen will rush in—10 or 15 or 20 of them—with cigars lighted and smoking, and it is offensive to the Members complaining. Two or three Members also have complained that occasionally some gentleman puts his feet upon the top of one of these benches, and they claim that is bad form. [Laughter.]

Now, the Chair hopes that all the Members will take to heart the request the Speaker made in the beginning, that they help him keep order in the House. The fact that the number of Members has been increased by 41 makes it harder than ever, a good deal harder, to maintain order.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. UNDERWOOD rose, amid applause.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is recognized.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3321) to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes; and, pending that, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all the Members of the House may have leave to print or extend their remarks in the RECORD until five days after the bill is disposed of.

The SPEAKER. Five legislative or five calendar days?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Five legislative days.

Mr. PAYNE. Five days, commencing with what time?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I say, five days after the bill is disposed of.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Five days after it passes the House?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; after it passes the House.

Mr. LANGLEY rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. LANGLEY. I rise to ask the gentleman from Alabama if that will be confined to the tariff bill—this extension of remarks?

The SPEAKER. Of course it will be confined to the tariff bill and will apply to nothing else.

Mr. LANGLEY. It ought to be so confined, but I did not so understand it, as it comes in under general debate, which is not limited to any particular subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the tariff bill; and, pending that, he asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen shall have leave to extend their remarks for five legislative days after the bill leaves the House——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And to print, if they do not speak.

The SPEAKER. And to print, of course.

Mr. BARTLETT rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BARTLETT. I want to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Alabama if I can.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Under the rules, those who speak on a bill, not those who ask leave to print or are authorized to print, are not limited to five days at the present time. Is it the purpose of the gentleman to require gentlemen who address the House upon the bill to print their remarks within the five days?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As I understand the rule, a Member has the right and the opportunity, until the RECORD is closed, to correct his speech at any time. But my request was to allow the Members who did not speak to print, and those who did speak to revise and extend their remarks, up to and including five days after the conclusion of the bill in the House.

Mr. BARTLETT. That changes the present rule, so far as those who speak are concerned.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If a gentleman only corrects his remarks and does not revise and extend them, it does not change the rule.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The question is on resolving into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. PAYNE. Can an arrangement be made as to a division of time?

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, what about the matter of time?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to close general debate on this bill on next Tuesday morning. If gentlemen have any suggestions to make, I shall be glad to hear them.

Mr. MURDOCK. This is the situation with the Progressives in the House: We have reduced our demands for time to a minimum of six hours. Naturally we realize that our time is much dependent upon the amount of general debate permitted by the majority. If you go into the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule next Tuesday, how many days or how many hours will that give us for general debate?

Mr. GARNER. Ten hours a day for 5 days would make 50 hours.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It will be in the neighborhood of 10 hours a day for 5 days, or 50 hours. I do not know whether it will run exactly that amount of time, because there may be times when some gentlemen may not be prepared to speak and the House will have to adjourn; but it gives an opportunity for 50 hours of general debate.

Mr. MURDOCK. That is what it would run—50 hours. The gentleman understands, of course, that in general debate there is always pressure for time at the end of the debate, and there is often great difficulty in getting gentlemen to speak at the beginning. Now, if an understanding is reached between the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and myself as to the proportion of time that we shall occupy, what arrangement can we have about using the time from day to day?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Why, it is customary in debate for one side to occupy an hour or two hours, and then for the other side to occupy an hour or two hours, and I think that is proper.

Mr. PAYNE. In other words, to equalize the time from day to day.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. To equalize the time as you go along. If you are not prepared to equalize the time as you go along, you ought to lose it.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. May I ask the gentleman a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. What is the nature of the rule under which this bill is going to be passed?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There is no rule adopted as yet, and I do not know that there will be any rule.

Mr. MURDOCK. Now, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK]?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MURDOCK. What division do you propose now to make as between the two minorities?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I prefer to go into Committee of the Whole and allow the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole to regulate the time, because he can do it more conveniently than I can.

Mr. PAYNE. If the gentleman will allow me right there, I have had some talk with the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] this morning, and I told him I thought an equitable division of the time between the two parties in the minority would be one hour out of five for the Progressives; that is, out of every five hours allotted to the minority that the Progressives should have one hour and the Republicans four hours as we go along from day to day, and that the gentleman ought to use his proportion of the time from day to day.

Mr. MURDOCK. We are perfectly willing to do that.

Mr. FORDNEY. I have no doubt you are perfectly willing, because that gives you much more time than you are entitled to.

Mr. MURDOCK. Not at all.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; it does.

Mr. MURDOCK. Not at all.

Mr. FORDNEY. I object to any such inequitable rule. The Progressives are entitled to one hour out of seven and not any more, I will say to the gentleman from New York, in proportion to their representation, out of the time allotted to this side. Why should they have one hour out of five?

Mr. GARNER. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole might give them more than that.

Mr. FORDNEY. Let him do it, then.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask all gentlemen to refrain from conversation, and all except those who are engaged in this effort to arrive at an understanding to take their seats.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that these various gentlemen who lead different aggregations on that side of the aisle permit the request for the five days to be granted——

Mr. MANN. There has been no such request made. The gentleman, as usual, is behind the times.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Alabama made that request.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon; he made no such request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama made an announcement, not a request, that he wanted to close this general debate next Tuesday morning.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is no reason why the whole House should be detained while gentlemen on that side are trying to accommodate 5 per cent of the membership of the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Kansas that although there is two-thirds of the House on this side of the aisle and one-third on that side, there is no disposition on our part not to conform to the general rule to give one-half of the time to the minority, but the minority must arrange the division of their time between themselves. I think if the gentleman from Kansas and the gentleman from New York will reach an agreement, that the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union will carry it out as far as the time is concerned.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I submit that the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, while he may recognize a gentleman for 10 or 20 minutes, can not take any gentleman off the floor if he is recognized in general debate short of one hour, if he wishes to maintain the floor. Hence it is desirable, so many gentlemen wishing to address the committee, to have a division of the time where a limited time can be granted. Now, if the gentleman from Alabama will permit, I will ask unanimous consent that the time of general debate be limited to matters relating to the bill, to be equally divided between the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], with the provision that the gentleman from Kansas be allowed six hours of the minority's time yielded to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois, but if that is agreed to I shall couple with it the other provision that general debate shall close on Monday.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman that I shall not object to that, except that my observation has been in the House that almost invariably upon these bills the gentleman himself and others on his side will desire an hour or two probably on Tuesday, by general agreement. I shall not object to the request to close debate, but the gentleman can move to close debate at any time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; and the House can change it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Just as soon as I have submitted this request. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate on this bill close when the House adjourns next Monday night, and that the time be equally divided between myself, as chairman of the committee, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], with the understanding that the gentleman from New York will yield the portion of his time to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] which has been agreed upon between them.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the gentleman can see that under that arrangement the control of the time passes from me into the hands of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; he yields to you.

Mr. MURDOCK. How does he yield to me? There is no provision in this request made by the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. PAYNE. If that agreement is made, I will yield to the gentleman from Kansas an hour each day, or such time as is equitable.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that debate on this tariff bill close when the House adjourns next Monday.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. MOORE. To ask the gentleman from Alabama a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH] asked if we were proceeding under any rule, and the gentleman from Alabama stated that there was no rule. There is a rumor, coming from the street as it were, that the bill would be read under a rule and that there would be a limitation upon the number of amendments that might be offered by the minority. Is any such proposition contemplated?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No such proposition has been agreed upon up to this time. I do not know that there will be. Of course we want reasonable latitude in the consideration of this bill and expect to grant it. If an exigency should arise, if it is necessary to adopt a rule to get the bill through the House it will be adopted.

Mr. MOORE. I have no desire to filibuster against the bill, nor would I; but there are many paragraphs to which amendments ought to be offered in justice to Members on this side of the House and concerning which there ought to be some discussion. If a limitation is put upon the ability of a member of the minority to offer amendments, of course that checks his efforts to properly represent the wishes of his constituents. I desire to know whether we are to proceed under any such limitation, it being reported there would be a rule of that kind.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There is no rule agreed on. I do not know whether it will be necessary to adopt a rule. As far as I know at this time, the bill will be read under the five-minute rule, although that program may be changed; but I will say this to the gentleman, that if he desires to make an extended argument on this bill he should make it in general debate, because I intend, when we get into the Committee of the Whole, to enforce the five-minute rule.

Mr. MOORE. That is the very point. In general debate, of course, we would be limited to an hour, but when we come to read the bill, say, when the chemical schedule is read, and one paragraph is reached that may be of vital interest to constituents of any one of the Members, and an amendment is offered, will there be a restriction upon the number of amendments that may be offered by those who endeavor to defeat the paragraph?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We expect to take the bill up, as far as I know at the present time, under the rules of the House, and, as the gentleman knows, there is no limitation on amendments, under the rules of the House.

Mr. MOORE. If there is to be no limit upon the five-minute rule——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, I am not prepared to answer the gentleman's question now. I can only say to him that there has been no rule agreed upon. I do not know whether there will be.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman permit me to say this, that the district I represent, for instance, is largely a manufacturing district, and I presume there is scarcely a single paragraph in the bill that does not in some way or other affect those interests. It will be manifestly impossible to offer an amendment to every paragraph in accordance with the wishes of my constituents, but there ought at least to be some demonstration of their interests here, something ought to be done by their Representative to at least explain their wishes. If a Member under those circumstances should attempt to amend every paragraph according to the wishes of his constituents, it would be an interminable operation. I want to know whether the committee had thought of a rule or had intended, as rumor reports, to have a rule?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If gentlemen on that side desire to offer their amendments by sections, I am willing to agree to a proposition of that kind by unanimous consent.

Mr. MOORE. What does the gentleman mean by "sections"?

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have already yielded to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I will yield to the gentleman from Kansas in a moment.

Mr. MOORE. I want to get a definition of the word "sections."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If gentlemen on that side prefer by unanimous consent to agree that this bill shall be taken up and considered by schedules, I think there would be no disposition on my part not to agree with them.

Mr. MOORE. I want to get the gentleman's meaning. He said there would be no objection to considering the bill by sections. How does he differentiate as between sections, paragraphs, and schedules? Ordinarily we consider a bill under the five-minute rule by paragraphs. Is "sections" a different proposition?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In the first section there are a number of schedules—14, I believe. The balance of the bill has 3 sections. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania has a proposition to make asking unanimous consent to consider the bill along that line, I would be very glad to hear what it is.

Mr. MOORE. That is just the point. I hope the gentleman will bear with me for a moment.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not attempt to amend the rules in regard to the five-minute debate at this time.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, if I understand right, this means that there will not be any opportunity to offer amendments until in some instances over 100 pages of the bill have been read.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no proposition. This proposition I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania was making.

Mr. MOORE. That is to say, no amendment until we have completed the reading of the entire tariff schedule, and then no amendment until we have finished the income-tax schedule, and then no amendment until we have finished the administrative section.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has erected a mark to shoot at, and is now shooting at his own mark. The suggestion did not come from me. It came from the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE. Then will the gentleman answer a specific question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not know whether I will or not.

Mr. MOORE. It is provided in this bill that the duty upon wool shall be free. When we reach the wool paragraph will it be in order to offer to amend it so that there will be a duty say of 18 cents per pound upon wool?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We will determine that question when we reach it.

Mr. MOORE. Then we can not reach it until we finish the section. That is good-by to amendment.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will yield, I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania is in error. I discussed the matter at the time with the gentleman from Alabama. It was proposed, as I understand, by some gentlemen on the majority side to provide for eight hours of general debate and then amendment in a certain way. The gentleman from Alabama has now proposed five days of general debate. My understanding is that after the close of general debate it is the present intention of the gentleman from Alabama to allow liberal debate under the five-minute rule in this way. Of course it is quite patent that if on every paragraph in the bill amendments were offered, even one amendment or various amendments upon each paragraph and then considerable discussion, we would be here much longer than the gentleman from Alabama would consent or the majority would consent to, and I have no criticism of him for that; but within reasonable limitation, without any effort upon this side to filibuster, I think we can rely upon having a reasonable opportunity for debate with the knowledge that if it is protracted long under the five-minute rule the gentleman from Alabama I think would be justified from his point of view in stopping it by bringing in a rule.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois it is not my purpose to unduly cut off reasonable debate, but I do intend to insist that the speeches shall be limited to five minutes each.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman from Alabama yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is not all this discussion proof of the fact that if the plans of the Progressive Party were carried out as regards the tariff [laughter], a revision of the tariff one schedule at a time at a session, then we should have a real discussion of the bill, with full right of amendment under the five-minute rule? Is not that the fact?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, the gentleman has that same right now, I am inclined to think.

Mr. MURDOCK. Not at all. If the gentleman from Alabama brings in an omnibus bill at one session of Congress and expects the consideration under the five-minute rule of such a bill in a very few days——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not in a few days. There is no distinction whatever between the consideration of this bill under the five-minute rule as a whole bill and considering 14 schedules under the five-minute rule as 14 schedules. There is no distinction whatever.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman will find in practice, as he knows, that there is a distinction.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not know of any, and I think my friend from Kansas ought to take lessons on the rules if he finds where such a distinction lies.

Mr. MURDOCK. If the gentleman will remember former experiences, he will recall that toward the conclusion of the consideration of any tariff measure under the five-minute rule amendments offered under the five-minute rule are usually voted down with an uproar, a hurrah, and a rush, and there is no real consideration of them. That will be demonstrated in the consideration of this bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does my friend from Kansas expect the Progressive Party to put any amendment offered on this bill, whether it was offered to sections or to the——

Mr. MURDOCK. The Progressive Party expects consideration by the entire body of any amendment they offer.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly; and they will have consideration.

Mr. MURDOCK. And it does not desire to be met by the cry which will be heard in a few days—the cry of "Vote, vote, vote!"—in a session according no consideration of amendments offered, with no attention by a House wearied with long discussion. Meritorious amendments are voted down without real consideration here, and the gentleman knows that is true in regard to every tariff bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] that my experience with this House has been this, that if a man offers a meritorious amendment and backs it up by reason this House always listens to it. And I think when my friend says he anticipates the amendments coming from his party are going to be hooted down, he reflects on the intelligence of his own party.

Mr. MURDOCK. Not at all. And I will say to the gentleman from Alabama that he knows it to be the experience in this House, in the consideration of a long measure, that the first amendments offered to the first paragraphs in the bill usually get very careful consideration and are given long debate, but at the close of consideration of a long bill such as this there is no real consideration given to the amendments.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MURDOCK. I do not think the gentleman ought to take me off my feet.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. In two minutes I intend to demand the regular order.

Mr. MANN. I do not think the gentleman ought to interfere. This is not an appropriation bill.

Mr. MOORE. The first section of this bill contains 132 pages.

Mr PAYNE. The gentleman knows the rule is that a bill is considered by paragraphs.

Mr. MOORE. If the gentleman from Alabama will permit me to ask, Is the gentleman from New York in favor of the passage of this bill as it is written or does he think it ought to be amended?

Mr. PAYNE. There is no occasion to ask any such question as that. I am in favor of getting this time for debate fixed first and have general debate on the bill.

Mr. MOORE. I want to ask a very simply question, which is whether or not we may have opportunity to offer an amendment to this bill under the five-minute rule before we have reached page 132?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will refer the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] to the rules of the House, which will give him full information and which say that when a bill is read under the five-minute rule he can offer an amendment to each paragraph as it is reached, which I am sure the gentleman from Pennsylvania knows.

Mr. MOORE. At the proper time, when we have reached the item of potatoes, may we have an opportunity to offer an amendment taking them from the free list?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can not hear the gentleman.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MOORE. I want to know——

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded, and that is for the Chair to put this demand for unanimous consent. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent, pending the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, that general debate on this bill shall be closed with the adjournment of the House on next Monday; in the meantime that the time shall be divided equally between himself and the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] agreeing to yield six hours to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], to be disposed of as the gentleman from Kansas chooses—in 1 speech or 15, or any other number. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote on my motion.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on the bill H. R. 3321.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 3321, a bill to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, with Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee in the chair.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to fix the time for debate on this bill, so that it may be definitely known by the Members, and, therefore, having discussed the bill to this extent, I intend to move for the committee to rise, and when we get back in the House I intend to move that general debate shall be closed on Monday next.

Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 3321) to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that general debate on the bill H. R. 3321 close when the House adjourns on Monday next. And I wish to state, Mr. Speaker, that I make this motion at this time so that the House may be given full opportunity of knowing as to when this debate shall close.

I shall now yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] before moving the previous question, if he desires that I yield to him.

Mr. MANN. I suppose the motion is not in order until the House has again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will make that motion, Mr. Speaker, and, pending that motion, I will make the other motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 3321) to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes; and, pending that——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I move that general debate on the bill H. R. 3321, the tariff bill, be closed when the House adjourns on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. And pending that, the gentleman from Alabama moves that general debate on the tariff bill close at the adjournment of the House next Monday.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I renew the unanimous-consent request made by the gentleman from Alabama a few moments ago.

The SPEAKER. And, pending both motions of the gentleman from Alabama, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that the time be equally divided, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and the other half to be controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], with the further provision that the gentleman from New York yield six hours of his time to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], to be disposed of as the latter gentleman chooses. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. That carries with it, I suppose, the proposition that the debate close on Monday?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That was the understanding. Was not that included?

Mr. MANN. That was a part of the gentleman's motion.

The SPEAKER. It also includes the proposition that the general debate on the tariff bill close when the House adjourns next Monday. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MONDELL. To reserve the right to object, in order to make a few observations.

The SPEAKER. It is too late to object to that.

Mr. MONDELL. I understood the Chair to ask if there was objection.

The SPEAKER. Did not the Chair also say he heard none? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. The Chair did at one time, but the Chair again asked if there was objection.

I have just a brief observation to make. I do not intend to object, but I want to call attention to the fact that the arrangement that is made is exceedingly liberal to the minority party, with emphasis on the "minority."

It is probably true that there will not be 50 hours of general debate.

The House will not continue in session 10 hours a day during this debate. If it does, it will establish a new record, and therefore the time of debate will not be 50 hours, but something less. But whether we are in session or in debate 50 hours or 40 hours or 30 hours the minority is to have 6 hours.

I do not object to it, but I simply want to call attention to the fact that it is an exceedingly liberal arrangement to the Progressives.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The gentleman from Alabama withdraws his supplementary motion and moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the tariff bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 3321) to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, with Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3321, of which the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3321) to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is recognized.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, the enactment of this bill into law will mark the beginning of a new era in the fiscal legislation of this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

For many years before the Civil War this Government was administered under low-tariff conditions, beneficial to the citizenship of the country and not detrimental to the growth of the industries of the United States. The high taxes that we now pay at the customhouses were levied to meet the exigencies of a civil war and are the outgrowth of war conditions. After the war was over the necessity of retaining high-taxation measures on the statute books had passed, but interested parties who had been able to amass fortunes out of this indirect system of taxation have been able to control the Government, with but one brief period intervening, for the last 50 years and have maintained this unjust system of war taxation.

Four years ago this House faced the same situation it is facing to-day. The party then in power, the administration then controlling public affairs, had been elected to office on a distinct promise to the people to revise the customs taxes downward in the interest of the taxpayer.

It is unnecessary at this time to go into the details of how that party failed to keep its promise or of how and why it has been repudiated by the American people for that failure. It is sufficient to say that the Payne bill had hardly been enacted into law before its own advocates commenced apologizing for it and proposing tariff commissions or other methods of revising their own enactment, recognizing the fact themselves that the American people were not satisfied with the bill they had passed and that they must give some excuse for their failure to keep their pledged faith with the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The election of 1910 was a repudiation of the party that passed the law now on the statute books. A Democratic House was sent here to revise the tariff in the interest of the American people. They proposed a series of bills. Many were passed by a Republican Senate, and went to a Republican President, who vetoed them.

The House must bear in mind that we have been living under practically the same system of taxation since 1897, when the Dingley bill was enacted just prior to the Spanish War. Irrespective of theory, the condition of the country has entirely changed since that time, both from the standpoint of the consumer and of the manufacturer.

When the hearings were had on the Payne tariff bill I recall that the room was filled with American manufacturers, insisting that radical changes should be made in the Dingley law, and that the system of taxation then in vogue was obsolete and out of touch with the industrial conditions of the country. Yet they woke up to find the law substantially reenacted, and the relief that even the industries of the country sought against these unjust burdens of taxation was not granted.

The real question that we have to consider is that of the rights and interests of the consuming masses of the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The question of industry in this country is, and from our standpoint must always be, secondary to the rights and necessities of the great American consuming public. [Applause.]

So far as the people were concerned, the main reason why a revision of the customs laws was both demanded and expected was because of the increased cost of living since the enactment of the Dingley bill in 1897. During that period I find from statistics that the value of farm products have increased 93 per cent; food, 47 per cent; clothing, 36 per cent; metals and implements, 48 per cent; drugs and chemicals, 24 per cent; house-furnishing goods, 24 per cent; and all commodities covered by the present law have increased on an average 47 per cent.

I do not contend, nor would it be fair to say, that this increase in values is wholly due to the tariff. In some cases it is and in others it is not. But it is safe to say that a large portion of the increased cost of living to the American citizen has grown directly out of the system of taxation levied to protect the great manufacturing interests of this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If that were not true, we would find the cost of living in countries like England, which has no such system of taxation, as high as ours. On the other hand, we know in many countries not maintaining a high protective tariff, although the cost of living has increased to some extent, the actual cost to each individual is far less and has increased proportionately less than it has to the people of the United States.

Although we have reduced the tariff in the interest of the consumer in this bill, it would be untrue to say that the effect of this reduction is going to be immediate. There are many reasons why we can not promise this to the people, but there is one which is quite sufficient. Under all the laws of trade supply and demand must regulate prices. The retail merchants of the country have fixed their prices to-day on goods now on their shelves, which were bought under conditions fixed by Republican legislation. They will not reduce their prices until they are compelled to do so, nor will they begin to reduce the price to the consumer until competition from fellow merchants forces them to do so. That competition will naturally not arise until the merchant has disposed of the goods on his shelves, which he has purchased under conditions of a high Republican tariff.

But I do fully believe that within a reasonable time, when present stocks of goods are sold out, the American people will receive a real reduction in the cost of living if this bill is enacted into law. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Whenever it is proposed to reduce the taxes levied for privileged classes the cry is always raised that it will impair industry. The greatest moving cause for the impairment of industry in the United States in the last 50 years has been the shackles fastened by high protective legislation to the ships of industry, like the barnacles at sea that cling and drag downward. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It is this high cost of living to employees that of necessity increases the cost of production. It is the high cost of supplies that industry must bear that increases its cost of production. It is this increased cost of production that has chained American industries to our shores and prevented them from going out among the nations of the earth to spread the goods and wares of American enterprise in foreign markets and to secure the fruits of American labor and American enterprise to the people of our great country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But it has done yet another thing. It has stifled enterprise, throttled energy, and placed a premium on incompetency.

Not as a result of our investigation, but from an investigation set on foot by gentlemen who sat on that side of the aisle, not through our agents, but through their agents, we find that a tariff board, appointed by them to inquire into the conditions of these great industries, reports that they find establishments maintained by this tariff system where the machinery operating is 60 years old; these establishments have taken their profits in the past to pay enormous dividends to stockholders, depleting their own enterprises for personal greed, and are maintaining a business to-day with worn-out, ancient, and ineffective machinery; yet they ask the American people through taxes to maintain the price they place on their product. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That is the condition that confronts these gentlemen, who prefer to maintain on the statute books a Dingley and a Payne law in the interest of decadent corporations rather than reduce the tariff by voting for a bill that will relieve the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The bills that we propose to the country are not new. We are not taking advantage of the American people in proposing them. A Democratic House was returned two years ago and wrote a series of bills revising this tariff, and we presented them to the country as our platform. They were indorsed by the national platform of the Democratic Party as a flag under which we would fight our battles. We went to the country, and the American people have returned to this House one of the greatest majorities any party has ever had in these Halls since the Civil War. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We do not speak for ourselves, but we speak through the authority of an edict from the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The great contending parties in this Nation hold two diverse theories when it comes to writing a tariff bill. The Republican Party stands for a protective tariff, which they have defined as a tariff that equals the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, with the addition of a reasonable profit to the home manufacturer. I have seen some Republicans who have attempted to abandon that platform, but, so far as I know, the great party leaders are standing to this position in defeat as they stood to it in the days of their power. Therefore I think I can fairly take that definition as representing the position of the political enemy confronting us. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Ways and Means of the House do not reach their conclusions from the same standpoint that our political adversaries would. Gentlemen on the other side of the aisle believe that we should adjust a tariff to meet the difference in cost of production at home and abroad, together with a reasonable profit. That position of necessity must rest on the basis of the cost of production. The majority members of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House not only do not agree with that theory but we have not attempted to write this bill upon that basis. As a matter of fact, I contend that the theory is not defensible, that it is impossible for anyone to reach a conclusion based upon the difference in the cost-of-production-theory. If the money cost of production is made a test in certain classes of goods, the prices are not fixed by the lowest cost of production, but by the highest. This is true of every commodity subject to the law of diminishing returns. When the price is fixed by the cost of producing it, that portion of the supply which is brought into existence under the least favorable conditions must fix the basis. I do not think that anybody will deny the economic proposition that if wheat is selling in the markets at 75 cents a bushel the price of wheat is fixed by the market price and not by the question of whether it costs a dollar a bushel to raise wheat or 25 cents a bushel to raise wheat. As a matter of fact, it is not always the best land that fixes the price. It is more often the poorest land that fixes the price of a commodity that is raised upon it, when there is not sufficient good land to drive the poor land out of business. It is not always the State that can produce a commodity at the lowest price that is the rival for the control of that market, because you may have State A, which can produce both corn and wheat more cheaply than State B, but it may be more productive and profitable for State A to raise corn than wheat, so the market for wheat may come from State B, which is the least advantageously situated to produce the supply.

If you are fixing the tax on the commodity, my friends upon that side of the House, how are you going to determine the cost of production? Are you going to measure it between the best mill in America and the best mill abroad, or are you going to measure it between the worst manufacturing enterprise in America and the best abroad? Where are you going to find your measure on which to fix this difference in the cost of production at home and abroad? More than that, if you stand by that difference-of-cost theory, with what country are you going to measure it? It is manifest that in a great many of the textile products there is great difference between the English, the German, and the Italian cost of production. Which of them are you going to measure your tariff against? Which are you going to say is the true measure of the difference in cost of production upon which to levy this tariff—the English mill, the German mill, or the Italian mill? You have to fix on one or the other; you can not use them all. Ah, but you may say that you will find an average, that you will take the average cost of production at home and the average cost of production abroad; but if you do, I say that averages necessarily protect no one. The average, if you use that basis, will drive out of existence the weaker mill. The average, if you are going to stand upon that basis, will give undue protection to the stronger mill. Therefore you can not find an intelligent basis on which to ascertain the difference in the so-called cost of production at home and abroad [applause on the Democratic side], nor can you write an intelligent tariff act upon that basis, and the proof of it is that you never have done so.

The Democratic Party stands for a tariff for revenue only, with the emphasis upon the word "only." [Applause on the Democratic side.] We do not propose to tax one man for the benefit of another, except for the necessary revenue that we must raise to administer this Government economically. Then how do we arrive at a basis in writing a revenue tariff bill? We adopt the competitive theory. We say that no revenue can be produced at the customhouse unless there is some competition between the products of foreign countries and domestic products; that if you put the wall so high that you close the door to importation no revenue can be raised, and that if you want to raise revenue at the customhouse you must admit some importations before the tax will fall upon them and revenue be derived.

Now, if you will follow the amount of imports into this country based on the Republican bills on the statute books for the last 50 years, you will find in every schedule, in nearly every paragraph, impassable walls and mountain peaks over which it is impossible for importations to come, and then you will find a low valley through which imports are allowed to flow to produce some revenue. You have for 50 years played favorites. You have given to your chosen minions the power to tax the American people by building prohibitive tariff walls, and you have opened the gates of those walls to revenue from those for whom you did not care. [Applause on the Democratic side.] In this bill we have not been able at one fell swoop to wipe out all the iniquities, the injustices, and favoritism that you have ingrafted on the body politic in five decades, but so far as this committee and our party is concerned we have played favorites with no man. [Applause on the Democratic side.] No favored manufacturer has sat behind the closed doors of the Ways and Means Committee to dictate the taxes that he should be allowed to levy on the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We have given an honest, open, and fair hearing to every man who desired it, regardless of his politics or business. We have not been able to wipe out all the favoritism that you have ingrafted in these bills, because a great many of the industries in the United States have been built up on the rotten foundation that you placed under them. Too great harm would result to industries, to the thousands of workers and laborers employed therein, were we suddenly to destroy these foundations. So far as it was practicable to do so without working an absolute injustice to the American consumer, we have endeavored to lower the tariff wall with a jackscrew, since it was not our commission to lower it with an ax. Now, you say, how can we work out our theory of a competitive tariff? When we discard the theory of cost of production and admit that some competition should exist in every line of industry, then it is a simple proposition to compare the amount of imports coming into this country with the amount of goods consumed, and you can ascertain at the customhouse whether there is any competition, reasonable competition, or drastic competition. Unfortunately we have not had the data in all instances to determine this, but we have written a provision into the bill requiring the President of the United States to furnish the Congress annually with such information, and when exact knowledge of the amount of imports and the American consumption in any given article is secured you will be able to tell at a glance whether the rates you levy at the customhouse are reasonably competitive, drastic, or prohibitive, and this gives you the basis on which to adjust your rates.

Of course this is not true with every commodity. Some things are so essential to the life of the individual that they should be given him without taxation, regardless of whether or not they are competitive, but as a general rule in this bill we have sought to fix a reasonably competitive tariff at the customhouse, with this exception—well, I withdraw that expression; it is not an exception—with this qualification: That we levy high taxes on the luxuries of life and endeavor to place the taxes on the necessaries as low as possible consistent with raising a reasonable amount of revenue. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, before passing away from the cost-of-production theory and the competitive theory of levying a tariff tax, we always hear a cry from the great manufacturing interests of this country that you can not lower the tariff without affecting the price of labor. I heard that cry from one man who appeared before the Ways and Means Committee in the last hearings, when subsequent testimony showed that he was working the poorest class of foreign labor in the sweatshops of New York. Yet he came before the Congress of the United States asking for a protective tariff to protect labor that was undergoing the grind of the garret sweatshops of his own city. Of course, we are proud of the fact that many American laborers obtain higher wages than they do abroad, but it is largely due to their own industrial organizations, since by reason of their labor unions they have enforced justice from those great manufacturing interests that would not have been accorded them otherwise. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And more than that, it is not the cost of labor that counts so much as it is the efficiency of labor, and in many of these great enterprises the testimony shows that by reason of the efficiency of labor the unit of cost of production in America is cheaper than abroad. But that is not the only question that we have to consider. You must not overlook the fact in trying to work out the theoretical difference in cost of production at home and abroad that the problem of transportation costs is one of the great vital questions involved. The question of carrying the raw material to the furnace or the factory is a greater item in the cost of production than even the labor cost.

The question of carrying the finished product from the factory to its ultimate market is one of the most important factors to be considered. And this fact is recognized. But how are you going to balance it? Are you going to balance it for the products of the United States Steel Corporation produced at Pittsburgh, at the Atlantic seaboard, or on the Pacific coast? Are you going to balance the cost of transportation for the citrus fruit industry of California, at the Mississippi River, or at the Atlantic Ocean? Why, I had before me a representative of the great iron industry of this country some time ago, and he stated, what is a fact, that the cost of transportation on iron piping from the Pittsburgh factories to San Francisco is $10.50 a ton freight rate, while that from the English mills to San Francisco is only $5 by water route. He insisted that we should determine the competitive point, or the point of difference in cost of production, at San Francisco, and that we should equalize the freight-rate difference between $5 a ton, the English rate, and $10.50 a ton, the Pittsburgh rate, for iron pipe at San Francisco. In other words, that we should levy on all the people of the United States a tariff tax in order that he might compete with a producer that had cheaper water transportation to San Francisco. That is the basis on which you have been building tariff rates, but it is not a basis that the American people will ever recognize as fair or just or right. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

My friends on that side of the House were guilty of exactly that proposition when they enacted the Payne tariff law. The lemon industry of California, under a tax of 1 cent a pound on lemons, was able to pay the freight rates eastward and practically control the American market up to the Allegheny Mountains. They saw that other people had prohibitive tariff rates, so they demanded of you, and you gave it to them, an increase of taxation on lemons from 1 cent a pound to 1½ cents a pound, in order to force the American people to buy their lemons from California and pay the inland freight rate so that they might drive out of the American market the lemons grown across the water in Sicily. You did that for them. That is the way you wrote this tariff and fixed the difference in cost at home and abroad. With what result? You raised the price of lemons in every hospital in the United States; you raised the price to the poor and to the dying in their beds to satisfy the greedy maw of the California fruit producers. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, in this speech I can not go into details concerning the changes in the bill. When the bill comes up under the five-minute rule it will give me pleasure to answer any question the gentlemen desire to ask in reference to it. But I desire to point out here the basis on which this bill has been constructed—by levying taxes on the luxuries of the rich and reducing them on the necessaries of the poor. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In the Payne bill attar of roses was free. Under this bill we levy a tax on it of 20 per cent. In the Payne bill perfumery was taxed an equivalent ad valorem rate of 72 per cent. In this bill we tax perfumery at an equivalent ad valorem rate of 74 per cent. In the Payne bill highly scented toilet soap was taxed 50 per cent, and we tax it 40 per cent. In the Payne bill, automobiles were taxed 45 per cent; we maintain that tax. In the Payne bill, gold manufactures were taxed 45 per cent; we raise the tax to 50 per cent, and the same on silver manufactures. Highly finished pile fabrics in Schedule J, the luxuries of the rich, were taxed in the Payne bill 60 per cent, and we maintain a tax of 45 per cent. You taxed oriental carpets at an equivalent ad valorem rate of 58 per cent; we maintain a tax of 50 per cent on them. Articles of silk wearing apparel you taxed 60 per cent, and we maintain a tax of 50 per cent on them. On jewelry you had a tax amounting to about 76 per cent and we place a tax of 60 per cent. So, my friends, as I demonstrate to you, on the luxuries of the rich——

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. That lowers them?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We lowered them, and I will tell you why, my friends. I know it never would enter your mind that there could be any reason for lowering a tax on luxuries of this kind. The only reason we lowered them was because on some of them you had put the rate so unconscionably high that the articles could not come in, and we really wanted the Government to get from them a part of the revenue. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, I would like the gentlemen on that side of the House, who have maintained this indefensible system of taxing the poor for five decades, to listen to the other side of the story. On common soap you placed a tax of 20 per cent. We have lowered the tax to 5 per cent. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

You taxed the furniture of the poor man's house 35 per cent. We have lowered it to 15 per cent. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

You taxed bread and biscuits 20 per cent. We place them on the free list. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

On cotton clothing you taxed the people of this country 50 per cent. We have reduced it to 30 per cent. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

On the flannels that protect them against the cold winter storms you taxed the people of the United States over 93 per cent, and we have reduced the tax to 25 and 35 per cent. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The tax on women's and children's dress goods under your system of levying a tax for the benefit of the manufacturer was about 100 per cent, and we have lowered that to 35 per cent. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

You taxed the shoes of the people of the United States, after giving the shoemaker free raw material and stating at the time you gave it that he did not need the protection; you gave him 10 per cent and we give free shoes to the people of America. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, it is impossible to go into the numerous details of this bill, but I desire to call your attention to the changes of taxes by schedules. I will print the entire table in my remarks, but at this time I shall refer only to the averages.

Comparative summary showing total revenue, by schedules, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, and as estimated for the first 12-month period under H. R. 3321.

[1] The value of the imports for 1912 of the act of 1909 transferred from the free list to this schedule by H. R. 3321 was $15,052,409.

[2] The decrease in the estimated value of imports and the increase in the equivalent ad valorem compared with the chemical bill vetoed by President Taft is caused by the transfer to the free list of tanning extracts, barks, and woods, oils used in soap making, varnish gums, and also the increased rates on various articles, such as coal-tar dyes and colors, licorice root, etc

[3] The value of the imports for 1912, transferred from the free list of the act of 1909 to this schedule by H. R. 3321, was $6,043,330.

[4] Though the rates are not increased, the estimated imports show an increase over 1912 because the latter was a year of abnormal importations, due to the termination of the reciprocity agreements with countries producing commodities dutiable under Schedule H. In anticipation of the higher rates of duty effective after the termination of these agreements, the importations were increased. Normal imports under existing rates of duty may now be expected since the overstock is practically consumed.

[1] The estimated imports under Schedule J show a large decrease from the year 1912, because all laces and embroideries included in this schedule under the law of 1909 have been transferred to Schedule N in H. R. 3321.

[2] The value of the imports for 1912, transferred from the free list of the act of 1909 to this schedule by H. R. 3321, was $28,790,338.

[3] The estimated imports under Schedule N show a large increase caused by the transfer of articles to it from other schedules, chiefly laces and embroideries that were formerly included in Schedules J, K, and L.

On the entire chemical schedule the tax was 25.91 per cent. Our taxes levied on that schedule are 19.64 per cent, or a reduction in the chemical schedule of 24 per cent below the Payne law. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

On earths, earthenware, and glassware you levied a tax of about 51 per cent. We levy a tax of 33 per cent, a reduction below the Payne bill of 35 per cent. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

On metals and manufactures of metals you levied a tax of 34 per cent. We levy a tax of 20 per cent, a reduction below the Payne bill of 41 per cent. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

On wood and the manufactures of wood you levied a tax of 12 per cent, and we levy a tax of 3½ per cent, a reduction of 71 per cent. We place most of it on the free list, in order that the American workman may have free lumber with which to build his own home. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

You have levied a tax on sugar of 48 per cent. We have reduced that tax to 35 per cent for the next three years, or a reduction of 25 per cent; and at the end of the three years we intend, if this bill becomes a law, to place it on the free list. [Applause on the Democratic side.] So that the one commodity above all others that most directly reflects the taxes levied at the customhouse no longer goes on the table of the consumer bearing the marks of 50 years of oppressive taxation that our friends on that side of the House have taught the American consuming public to recognize when they open their home door. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

As to tobacco and the manufactures thereof, we considered them as luxuries or in the nature of luxuries and good revenue producers, so made no vital change in the schedule.

On agricultural products and provisions we have reduced the tax from 29 per cent to 17 per cent, or a reduction of 42 per cent.

On spirits, wines, and other beverages we have left the taxes as they are in the present law.

On cotton manufactures you taxed the public about 46 per cent. We reduced the average tax to 30 per cent, making a reduction of 33 per cent below the Payne bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

On flax, hemp, and jute and their manufactures we have reduced the tax from 45 to 26 per cent, a reduction of 42 per cent below the Payne bill.

On wool and manufactures of wool you taxed the public nearly 56 per cent. We tax them 18½ per cent, a reduction in favor of the American people of 67 per cent below the Payne bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

On silk goods the tax was about 52 per cent. We tax it 44 per cent, or a reduction of 15 per cent.

On paper and books you taxed them 21 per cent. We tax them 12 per cent, or a reduction of 45 per cent.

The sundries schedule is the only one in this bill raised by us. You taxed sundries about 25 per cent, and we tax them 33 per cent, or an increase of 35 per cent. And why? Because we have plucked out of other schedules all the laces and embroideries and put them in one paragraph in the sundry schedule at the high rate of 60 per cent, because they are luxuries and highly competitive. Then we have increased the tax on uncut diamonds and on finished diamonds. We have gathered together a number of other luxuries, such as furs, and put taxes on them in this schedule in order that the luxuries of the rich might be taxed and the necessaries of the poor untaxed. [Applause on the Democratic side.] For that reason the bill shows in the sundries schedule an increase over the Payne bill. But taking an average for the whole bill, your bill last year showed 40.12 per cent, and our bill, under the estimate, will average 29.60 per cent, or a reduction below the Payne bill taxes of last year of 26 per cent. [Applause on the Democratic side.] This reduction exists notwithstanding the fact that we have increased the taxes on a number of luxuries that you did not tax, which, of course, raised the average for the entire bill.

Mr. Chairman, I shall not attempt to discuss the customs tax features of the bill further at this time. I wish to say, however, that this bill is the beginning of a new theory of levying taxes by this Government, a theory with which our Republican friends have taken direct issue.

They say in their report—now mark the words—

> In presenting this bill the committee is met with a threatened deficit in revenue of about $100,000,000, which it is compelled to meet by extraordinary methods of taxation used heretofore only in time of war. As a revenue measure the committee at the very outset confess this bill to be a failure. It would seem as if a party pledged to a revenue tariff would strive to make the revenue feature conspicuous.

What does the Republican Party mean by that? They can mean but one thing, that they intend in the future to stand as they have stood in the past, to continue to tax consumption in this country and let the great wealth of the United States go untaxed. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You say, gentlemen of the Republican Party, that we levied this income tax because we could not raise the revenue at the customs. Ah, my friends, you are so blind that you can not see the trend of the times. You are so reactionary that you can not realize that this great country of ours is moving on, not only in industrial growth but in the ideas and the thoughts and the rights of men. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Wedded to your idols, you thought we levied this income tax because we had to. Why, Mr. Chairman, we could have found this $100,000,000 at the customs if we had so desired; but the time has come in this country when the great untaxed wealth of America must and shall bear its fair share of the burdens of running the Government of the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We remove the taxes at the customhouse on necessaries purposely to levy a tax on wealth. I wish my friends on the other side to clearly understand this. [Applause on the Democratic side.] When you levy a tax on consumption the man of moderate means pays as much taxes on the clothes he wears and the food he consumes as the multimillionaire, and up to this time, except when the exigencies of war, as you say, required otherwise, you have exempted the great wealth of this country, notwithstanding the fact that we build a fleet and maintain an Army to protect that wealth against foreign foes or domestic troubles.

Yet a Republican committee, facing the hour of a change in the fiscal system of our country, still proclaim themselves on record as wedded to their idols and unwilling to tax the money of the rich. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I am not going into a full discussion of the merits of the income tax at this time. My colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL], is largely responsible for the work done on this section of the bill and is entitled to great credit for it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I will leave this portion of the bill for him to discuss when his time comes.

In regard to the revenues of the Government, we have printed in the report an estimate of revenues and expenditures under this bill. There are two portions of the income tax, one relating to the tax on corporations and the other relating to the tax on individuals. As we estimate it, the total income tax paid by individuals and corporations combined will amount to something more than $100,000,000. But we have included in our estimate, for the sake of convenience, $30,000,000 from the income tax with the internal-revenue tax, as it is so included in the estimate for last year's revenue. With the reductions in this bill, it will leave a deficit of about $69,000,000 from internal-revenue taxes, customs taxes, and other incidental sources, to be made up by the income tax. In that amount we have included the taxes that will be raised from corporations. We estimate that the amount of revenue that will be derived from personal income tax will be $70,000,000, leaving a surplus of revenue above expenditures of something over a million dollars.

Now, that looks like rather a close estimate, but it must be borne in mind that because of the contracts the last Congress had to assume from a previous Republican administration large increases in expenditures were necessitated for the Army and Navy. And then the last Congress increased the appropriations for the old soldiers, which expenditure also had to be met. These three items amount to $20,000,000 increase for the Army, $12,000,000 for the Navy, and $26,000,000 for pensions, making a total of $58,000,000.

Time of necessity will reduce the pension appropriation. The old soldiers of the country are all approaching 70 years of age. Unquestionably there will be a diminution in the amount of appropriations necessary to pay pensions within the next three years on account of the death of the present pensioners.

I believe, and feel that I can assert with confidence, that the increases made in the Army and the Navy appropriations in the past year by rigid and honest economy in the future will be reduced. So I am confident that under this bill, with the natural reductions coming from decreases in pensions and from economy in appropriations, we will not only have a million dollars of balance in our favor but we will have several millions. Indeed, I assuredly believe that the $40,000,000 which will be raised from sugar next year will be taken care of by these decreases when the three years have passed, and that it will not be necessary to increase taxes anywhere else to make up for the loss of revenue when all sugar goes to the free list.

There are a number of changes in the administrative features of this bill, but I prefer to discuss them under the five-minute rule and explain the details at that time. I have only a few words to say in conclusion. I believe that this bill is an honest revision of the tariff downward. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I believe that it is not so drastic as to jeopardize any legitimate industry; and by "legitimate industry" I do not mean those mills and factories that have gorged themselves on dividends in the past and left their floors and machinery to decay. There is no reason why they should be considered in this equation; but no legitimate industry is going to be injured by the enactment of this bill. I believe, on the other hand, that competition will bring industry to the firing line; competition will force it to its best endeavors; competition will develop it and strengthen it, so that it will no longer be a battle merely for the home market, but out of this competition will grow the strength that will carry our commerce beyond the seas. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, there is only a few words more. We are going to revise the tariff, and the Democratic Party is going to pass this bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I have insisted on a reasonable limitation of general debate to-day. I shall insist on a reasonable consideration under the five-minute rule because the country is waiting to see the effect of this bill. It makes no difference whether they agree with you in theory or with us, they are as one voice and one man in demanding that this legislation should be speedily enacted and that they may have an early opportunity to adjust themselves to the new conditions. [Applause on the Democratic side.] As the party in power, I say it is our duty to the country to send this legislation through as speedily as we can, with due regard for the rights of the minority in this House, which this side of the House is always willing to accord, giving a fair consideration and a reasonable opportunity to be heard. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Gentlemen, I thank you for your attention. [Loud applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Alabama yield for a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. MANN. Is it the intention of the gentleman now to yield to questions in reference to details concerning the bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would prefer to answer them when we take the bill up under the five-minute rule. As the gentleman understands, I have spoken for something over an hour and I am somewhat tired at this time.

Mr. MANN. I remember how vigorous the gentleman is, and that four years ago the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] spoke for nine hours explaining his bill—perhaps had need for that length of time, but we obtained the information, and I do not think we have to-day.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that the Committee on Ways and Means has prepared and presented to the House a statistical handbook, which it has made a part of its report, giving the details in reference to all of these matters. I do not care to yield to any questions, but if the gentleman desired——

Mr. MANN. Oh, I was asking for the information of Members of the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman from Illinois desires to ask a question, I will endeavor to answer it.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. But the gentleman from Illinois does not ask all of the questions for this side of the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not care to yield generally for that purpose at this time.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER]. [Applause.]

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, before I begin I desire to ask a question of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] which it is understood between us that he shall answer. The minority report says that Schedule K, wool and woolens, was practically unchanged in the Payne law from what it was in the Dingley law. Is that true?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry to confess that my friends have been guilty of such iniquity as reenacting the Dingley schedule into the Payne law practically without amendment I think there were three amendments.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for that correct statement of the case.

WHAT AILED US?

Mr. Chairman, from the country's viewpoint there were two sound reasons for dismissing the Republican Party from power. In the first place, we stubbornly resisted reasonable reforms. Why we did so it is hard to say. Perhaps the truculent manner in which those reforms were advanced may have had much to do with our course. No man likes to be seized by the throat. No man who is a man will stand being threatened, especially by a reformer. Moreover, he who has been breathing it longest is the poorest judge of the atmosphere of a crowded room. Perhaps, in like manner, we Republicans were so long in power that we ceased to be conscious of the trend of the public thought which enveloped us.

The second reason for our dismissal was the fact that the country, I am sorry to say, desires a revision of the tariff much farther-reaching than the Payne law.

Supposing these reasons for our dismissal to have been ample, yet they were supplemented by mendacity of a peculiar virulence. It is not true that we were corrupt. It is not true that the Payne law was a violation of our promises, express or implied. It is true, however, that the country was ill content with some of the schedules of the Payne law. It can not be denied that subsequent reports of the Tariff Board have confirmed, in part at least, the country's judgment with respect to Schedule I and Schedule K, cotton goods and woolen goods.

Here let me pay my tribute to the veteran leader from the State of New York

Mr. PAYNE. Schedule I and Schedule K never met with your approval. Over your protest and against your will they were voted into the law which bears your name.

Yet through the four years which have passed you have uttered no word to defend yourself at the expense of your coworkers. You have had a weary burden of reproach to bear, and right generously have you borne it.

In the appendix to this address I shall include statements just received from the Treasury Department, together with an official table. These documents show that the Payne law has proved in practice to be a downward revision of the tariff.

THE DEMAND FOR A CHANGE.

We failed to move with the age. That was the head and front of our offending. The Republican chieftains could not adjust their views to modern schools of thought. They persisted in governing the country in their own way, not in the country's way, and so we all came to grief. The trust magnate in his director's chair damned Taft because he attacked the trusts. The orator on the hustings damned him because he did not attack the trusts. The western farmer swore vengeance on the Republican Party because, as he said, New England manufactures were overprotected. The New England operative swore vengeance on the Republican Party because, as he said, the duty on the food products of the farm was too high.

On one thing alone everyone was agreed—that the Republican Party must pay the penalty.

SPILLED MILK.

It makes very little difference now whether the Payne law was a fulfillment of my party's pledges, as I earnestly believe, or whether it was a double-dealing, interest-controlled, diabolical perversion of our promises, as the country believes or wishes to believe. The Nation does not want the Payne law, the Nation will not have the Payne law. If necessary, the Nation would rather elect a Congress of numbskulls and charlatans who will administer the elixir which it seeks rather than retain a Congress of Æsculapians who insist on compounding the old formulas, which the Nation refuses any longer to swallow. Perhaps the old political physician may in the end prove right. Perhaps the new political physician may turn out to be only another Dr. Cook.

THE HOUR FOR ACTION.

But the time for disputation has expired. The Nation's wish has been ascertained. The new doctor has been summoned. The hour for him to prescribe has arrived. It behooves us old doctors to refrain from captious interference. We must stand by to assist when necessary, and we must refrain from too fervid prayers that the new treatment may result in the patient's prostration.

MEN MUST KEEP FAITH.

Radical legislation of all kinds I expect very soon. I see no reason to believe that the Democratic membership in Congress is a gathering of rogues. Far from it. Yet rogues they surely will be accounted if they fail to carry out the program which they have promised. But I believe that they will enact the far-reaching legislation in which they have so often expressed their belief. I predict that this Congress and probably the next will place on the statute books some overdue reforms which will prove beneficial, but even more of those unwholesome innovations of whose success the cloistered smatterer is so certain. I believe that the day has gone by when legislators can safely neglect or even desire to neglect the issues upon which they have been elected. I am glad that it is so. I hope and believe that the next four years will prove to all men that it is so. In that way alone can the confidence of the people in their chosen representatives be restored. That this lack of confidence is unjust I deeply feel. That it is the product of malicious misrepresentation I am sure. Nevertheless, it exists, and to-day like a wraith it haunts representative government.

So by keeping their pledges in letter and in spirit shall the Democrats perform a service to the Nation.

THE PENALTY OF FAILURE.

Yet a strict adherence to their promises will not alone suffice to retain them in power. Democratic theories and Democratic beliefs when given the form of law must entail success and prosperity or once again the people will turn away. If the future shall show that the price of that which labor produces can be lowered without interference with the remuneration of that labor itself, then the Democratic tenure of power will be long in the land. But if the future shall show that Democratic policies entail nothing beyond a crop of disasters, the country will look elsewhere for leadership.

THE PROGRESSIVE'S CHANCE.

Men sometimes forget their promises. Suppose that the Democrats fail to carry out their radical program. Will the country return at once to our party? I doubt it. The people wish to try some of these new ideas and are willing to risk the consequences of their proving disastrous. The Republicans have not given them the legislation which, wisely or foolishly, they wish. If the Democrats follow our example, it need surprise no one should the people turn to the Progressive Party. In fact, this is the only direction in which I can foresee a future for that party. If the Democrats prove radical, intelligent radicals will not vote to turn them out of power. Surely only men who are more than ordinarily attached to the new party's name will risk a division of the radical vote by supporting the Progressive candidates.

SAFETY-VALVE DUTIES.

The Republican doctrine of a sound customs tariff requires that duties shall be fixed neither too high nor too low. They must be so high that foreign nations can neither flood our markets with goods nor dump their surplus upon us. On the other hand, they must be so low that any unwarranted rise in the price of American products shall at once invite importations from abroad.

The ideal of you Democrats is a tariff for revenue, but to such an extent only as may be consistent with your promise that no legitimate industry shall be harmed by the pending revision. Attractive as such a proposition may sound, its execution is seriously hampered by the actual conditions which confront us.

THE DILEMMA.

Clumsy as it is, misleading to the farmer as it is, inconsistent and unjust as are many of its provisions, this bill nevertheless is an attempt to carry out the promises which you Democrats made to the people. Therein lies the difficulty—your promises conflict with each other. You can not ride two horses traveling in opposite directions. You can not by one and the same tariff law keep up the price which the farmer receives and yet reduce the price which his customer pays. You can not fairly impose free trade on the fisherman and the shoemaker and the woolgrower while you force them to buy supplies protected by a duty. Yet you can not grant free trade in all the articles which the fisherman and the shoemaker and the woolgrower use without openly and obviously and beyond dispute violating your promise not to injure any legitimate industry.

THE WHOLE IS EQUAL TO THE SUM OF ALL THE PARTS.

The market basket must not be taxed, and yet the farmer must be protected. That is the perplexing paradox which must be elucidated. When cooks learn to make omelettes without breaking eggs, when one arm of a balance can rise without the other arm descending, when a magnet is invented with both poles positive, then it may be possible to provide for free foodstuffs and at the same time for protected farm products.

Look at the grotesque attempt in this bill to pursue that will-o'-the-wisp. You Democrats profess to protect the farmer's sheep. You try to soothe the simple herdsman with a 10 per cent protection for his flock. Do you think that he will fail to note that you are admitting free of duty each and every element of which his flock is composed? What purpose, other than political, does it serve if you protect the herdsman's sheep while you admit free of duty the fleece of those sheep, the skin of those sheep, and the flesh of those sheep? You might just as well compliment the garment maker with a 25 per cent duty on suits of clothes and then square yourselves with the consumer by admitting coats free and waistcoats free and pantaloons free.

In this bill the farmer is enticed with a mirage which appears to be a duty of 10 cents a bushel on oats, but on closer inspection the hallucination disappears. Oats themselves may be protected, but oatmeal made from those oats is not protected, nor are rolled oats protected. All the oats which men eat are free, and the only reason why the oats which horses eat are not free also is because farmers have votes and horses have none.

The countryman is said to have accepted many a gold brick in his time. The countryman is a plain dealer; but nothing except the countryman's sense of humor will keep him from exploding when he hears about that 10 per cent duty on cattle which you have so kindly given him. What is a cow made of? A cow has bones; a cow has a hide; a cow has flesh; a cow has hoofs; a cow has horns; a cow has blood; a cow has hair; and a cow gives milk. The cow may be dutiable at 10 per cent, but her bones are free, her hide is free, her flesh is free, her hoofs are free, her horns are free, her blood is free, her hair is free, and her milk is free. Inasmuch as the entire cubic content of the cow is free, while the cow herself is dutiable, I am forced to the conclusion that the Democratic majority estimates the bovine soul to be worthy of just 10 per cent protection.

Wheat must pay a duty of 10 cents a bushel, while bread and biscuits made from that wheat are free, and flour made from that wheat is free if it comes from certain nations.

THE UNDERWOOD CONTRIBUTION TO ECONOMIC THOUGHT.

What possible protection are all these duties to the farmer? All his foreign competitor needs to do in order to avoid payment of any duty whatever is to convert his sheep into mutton and wool, his cattle into hides and beef, his oats into oatmeal, and his wheat into bread, biscuits, or wafers. So good-bye to the farmers' protection. And good-bye to the jobs of many an American who to-day is manufacturing food.

Since my boyhood I have heard men expound the theory of free raw materials. I am prepared to admit that this doctrine has made some headway with New England manufacturers. Unquestionably it has an appreciable following among our leading economists. It is evident, however, that the doctrine is old fashioned and is to be replaced by the Underwood dogma of "free finished products and taxed raw materials." Mr. Chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, I congratulate you on having written a new page in the history of political economy. Doubtless this new page will commend itself to those modern philosophers whose enthusiasm for a doctrine is in exact proportion to its novelty.

BOOTS AND SHOES.

Now, a few observations on shoemaking, the principal industry of my district.

When under the Payne law the duty on shoes was cut in two, I confess that I expected a vast increase in importations. I may have been so incautious as to predict some such occurrence.

At any rate, I was wrong. The importations of shoes remain small, while the value of our exports amounted in the fiscal year of 1912 to $16,000,000, of which $10,000,000 was absorbed by the various countries of the American Continent. As the value of our annual product of boots and shoes now amounts to $500,000,000, it will be seen that our export trade represents a little over 3 per cent of the total.

Because of the amount of our shoe exports and because of the fact that our shoe imports are negligible, the Democratic Committee on Ways and Means has felt justified in subjecting us to the unlimited competition of free trade.

I shall not to-day present my grounds for believing that free boots and shoes are a serious menace to one of our great industries. On the contrary, I admit at once that from the Democratic point of view it was consistent to put boots and shoes on the free list, for you Democrats believe that only actual imports can justify a duty on any given article.

Yes, Mr. Chairman, from the majority's viewpoint free boots and shoes may be just; but even so, where is the justice of charging a duty on any of the supplies which are required for use in the shoe industry? Shoe leather, the principal item, has been put on the free list, to be sure, but I hold in my hand a list of 30 different dutiable articles, all of which enter into the process of shoemaking.

The Democratic Committee on Ways and Means probably meant to act fairly by the shoemakers when it put leather on the free list. Yet it was a case of robbing Peter to pay Paul, and it was a pretty slim settlement of Paul's account at best. If shoes ought to go on the free list because there are no shoe imports, then leather ought to stay on the dutiable list because there are annually $6,000,000 to $7,000,000 of leather imports.

As a matter of fact, an injustice is to be done to the leather industry greater even than that which is to be done to the shoe industry. Both industries must buy in a protected market and sell in an unprotected market. The difference is that leather men are to be subjected to a foreign competition which has already clearly manifested itself even under the present rates of import duty.

Upon my word, Mr. Speaker, such a course as this is not free trade. It amounts to subsidizing the foreigner to fight our own shoemakers and our own tanners. To our own citizens we say, "You shall pay a tax or duty on many of your raw materials." To the foreigner we say, "You shall escape scot-free of any tax whatever."

FISH.

In the name of the consumer fish is to be put on the free list. Poisonous as that cup may be for the fisherman, his draft has been embittered because his sense of injustice has been aroused.

My Democratic friends, why did not you in the name of the consumer put rice on the free list?

Is it because rice yields a revenue? Fish yields more revenue. Is it because rice is imported, notwithstanding the present duty? More fish than rice is imported, notwithstanding the present duty. Is it because the cultivators of rice are poor men? In all the history of Gloucester, never was anyone able to retire from business on profits made in the fisheries.

What is the explanation then? Why in the name of the consumer do you distinguish between one raw food product and another raw food product? Why do you make fish of fish while you make fowl of rice and of vegetables, early and late, and, for a while at least, of sugar? Some one must throw light upon this question. Else it should be no cause for astonishment should the censorious accuse you Democrats of sectional favoritism.

THE FREE MARKET BASKET.

The Democratic Party, correctly enough, I imagine, expects to reap a bountiful political harvest from its adoption of the free market basket as a policy aiming at the reduction of the high cost of living.

Perhaps the free market basket may not satisfy the tariff longings of the farming States; but does any representative of an industrial community doubt for a moment the popularity of the free market basket? Is any man from a manufacturing State unconscious of the widespread belief that the tariff is responsible for the high price of food products? We may argue till we are black in the face that a duty of 1½ cents a pound on beef can not possibly raise the price 10 cents a pound. We may expend our eloquence on the axiom that a duty of 4 cents a pound on bacon can not account for the fact that the people are paying more for that article than they paid when the duty was still higher. Try as we may to divest our audiences of their error, we only succeed in divesting ourselves of our audiences.

Every Massachusetts Republican Congressman knows all that. Last autumn there was not one of us who was unaware of the temptation to insure his own election by declaring for free foodstuffs. Yet we knew in our hearts that duties on manufactures and duties on farm products must go hand in hand. How long did the protective system last in England after the repeal of the Corn Laws? Just about as long as it took the indignant British farmer to join with the free trader and wipe the whole slate clean.

THE PROPHETS ARE HIBERNATING.

So I admit that to-day the policy of the free market basket is at the height of its popularity. If the future shall show that the free market basket in actual operation is an empty market basket, the feeling in its favor will change. If time shall prove that the free market basket contains foodstuffs as high priced as ever, its popularity will wane.

Speaking of lower prices, as the day for the trial of the great experiment approaches I have detected a growing hesitancy on the part of my Democratic friends to specify just what foodstuffs will be cheaper. I commend their prudence.

By the same token I notice a tendency on my own side of the House to hedge a little on our forecasts of destruction.

The fact is that prophecy belongs in the category of lost gifts. We do not any of us know what is going to happen. We can not, for instance, foresee the future industrial policy of British trade-unions. We know that to-day the shoemakers of England restrict their output to a substantial degree. We know that the weavers of England object to the introduction of the automatic loom. We do not know how soon those unions may come to some arrangement with their employers. When that day arrives it is not unreasonable to expect that our shoe shops and our textile mills will speedily feel the results.

Exceptional crops may disguise the untoward effects, if any there be, of the pending bill, while diminished crops may intensify them. No matter what consequences may occur, men will always differ as to the extent with which the Underwood law of 1913 should be charged with the responsibility. Even at this late day men are still wrangling over the effects of the Wilson law of 1894.

FANTASTIC FORECASTS.

I am no herald of disaster, yet it is my belief that it is unjustifiable to assert that there is no ground for apprehension of industrial depression. Whether the business world is in the next few years to be subjected by the Government to the thumbscrew and the rack, as the alarmists tell us, or whether it is to be subjected to a surgical operation for its own good, as many persons contend—in either case it is not to be expected that the patient should display any noteworthy eagerness.

Yet, though there may well be a reasonable fear lest trade should slacken or even languish, and though the danger of prolonged unemployment is by no means lightly to be dismissed, it is fantastic to prate of total ruin when all around us we see vigor. The blind man may babble of our decadence, but the man of normal vision can see nothing but growth.

TO MY FELLOW CONVICTS.

A few words to my own side of the House. A decade ago the country believed that the Republican Party could do no wrong. For four years past the country has believed that the Republican Party can do no right. Unreason in praise, unreason in blame.

The Nation in its passion condemned us for a dishonesty of which we were not guilty. Having convicted and punished us, the Nation will now proceed to examine the evidence, and last of all perhaps the indictment may be reached. The indignation against us will grow fainter and fainter until at last men will ask each other whether after all it was justice which was meted out to us. When that day comes we shall be restored to power purged of the evils incident to every long tenure of office.

For the most part we Republicans are conservative; but we seek to conserve only that which is sound, and we seek to uproot and replace that which is outworn and detrimental. It is the ship of state which we wish to conserve, not the barnacles on her bottom nor the rats in her hold.

We are no boding tremblers who shrink from change.

Change may be violent and painful, yet its end is life. Decay may be calm and painless, yet its end is death.

It is decay, not change, which men ought to fear, and the Republican Party should give no heed to the timid mortal whose overwrought fancy can see only the ghastly specter of social upheaval lurking behind that which in reality is beneficent evolution.

OUR PARTY'S FUTURE.

If in the future we shall follow the wise policy of suppressing in season the abuses which human nature breeds, if in the future we shall refuse to tolerate unreasonable delay in the destruction of evils, then we may be certain that the Republican Party will be preserved as an heritage for generations yet to come.

Since the Republican Party was founded many a dynasty has fallen, many an ancient power has been overthrown from turret to foundation stone, many a scepter has been wrenched from many a majestic grasp.

My friends, we are now at the head of the column. We are the leaders who must choose the right road and reject the wrong road. The Republican book of fate is open and our names are on the front page. Falter, and we shall see our grand old party swept away into the awful past of things which once were great. Grasp the helm boldly and, by the grace of God, we shall bring our good dreadnought safe through the hurricane.

APPENDIX A.

Below are two recent letters from the Treasury Department which show that in practice the Payne law has proved to be a downward revision of from 4 to 6½ per cent. When it is remembered that the greater part of the increases of duty in the Payne law were confined to wines, spirits, silks, perfumery, and other luxuries it will be at once apparent that there was a substantial downward revision in that part of the tariff law in which the average man and woman is particularly interested:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 17, 1913.

Hon. A. P. GARDNER,
House of Representatives.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 10th instant, requesting information as to certain computations made by the Treasury Department in 1910, showing a comparison of the duties collected under the tariff act of 1909 with those that would have been collected on the same importations under the tariff act of 1897.

You state that Ex-Congressman E. J. Hill, of Connecticut, made the assertion in a speech that the computation showed that the importations considered actually paid into the Treasury under the Payne law $11,178,162.02 less than they would have paid if no change of law had been made. You request to be informed as to the following points:

First. Is the above difference correctly stated?

Second. What were the months covered by the computation?

Third. What were the aggregate importations covered by the computation?

In reply I have to state that:

First. The figures given are correctly stated, as shown by the computations made, which are believed to be correct. The amount stated represents the net decrease.

Second. The months covered by the computations were the six months from October 1, 1909, to March 31, 1910.

Third. The aggregate importations covered by the computations had a total value of $804,878,645.46, and these importations consisted of all dutiable items, Philippine goods, and items in the free list for the period mentioned, with the exception of various items having a total value of $2,983,830.97, relative to which the data at hand were insufficient to form a satisfactory basis for the computation of the duties under the act of 1897.

Respectfully,

J. F. CURTIS,
Assistant Secretary.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, April 1, 1913.

Hon. A. P. GARDNER,
House of Representatives, United States.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 19th instant, further in the matter of computations made on importations received under the tariff act of 1909, showing a comparison of the duties collected and the duties computed on the same importations under the rates of the tariff of 1897.

You state that you have been informed that such computations have been made for the period from April 1, 1910, to October 1, 1910, and you request information as to the following points:

First. Whether or not a computation has been made by the Treasury Department for an entire year showing a comparison of the duties collected under the tariff act of 1909 as compared with the duties that would have been collected on the same importations had the tariff act of 1897 still been in force?

Second. Which 12 months were covered by these importations?

Third. What results appeared—

(a) As to percentage of increase or decrease under the Payne law?

(b) As to the increase or decrease in the total amount collected under the Payne law?

In reply I have to state that the department did not make computations for the six months mentioned by you, but did for the fiscal year 1911, relative to which, in response to your questions, you are advised as follows:

First. Yes; the computation as outlined was made.

Second. The 12 months covered were those from July 1, 1910, to June 30, 1911.

Third. (a) The computations showed a decrease under the Payne law of 4.05 per cent. (b) The decrease under the Payne law shown by the computations was found to be $13,036,875.84.

As in the previous computations, the above figures represent the net decrease on the items compared, consisting of the dutiable items, Philippine goods, and items in the free list according to the importations for the period under consideration, except various items relative to which the data at hand were insufficient to form a satisfactory basis for a computation of the duties under the tariff act of 1897. The percentage of decrease is based on the duties computed under the tariff act of 1897.

With respect to the last paragraph of your letter, requesting information as to whether there is any printed publication which covers the points mentioned, I have to state that the department knows of no printed publication covering the points in question, as the computations were prepared in the form of typewritten schedules only during the years 1910 and 1911 for the use of the President.

Respectfully,

J. F. CURTIS,
Assistant Secretary.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, how much time has been consumed?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama has used 1 hour and 25 minutes, and the gentleman from New York has consumed 45 minutes.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY].

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I am sure that as one of the new Members here to-day I have listened with as much interest as anyone to these scholarly addresses by the gentleman from Alabama and the gentleman from Massachusetts.

They have told us a great deal of the theory of tariff, have elaborated upon the theories of a tariff for revenue only and a high protective tariff. They seem to forget that the vast majority of American citizens care less than nothing for academic theories and war crys and slogans fashioned to deceive.

The plain people of this country demand that the tariff be constructed with an eye single to the common welfare by a method which shall assure justice to all.

We have had tariffs for special interests, for war charges, for infant industries, for the manufacture of millionaires and paupers. The time is assuredly here for a tariff for the people. If you must have a theory, suppose we put it on the theory that things which are crooked and those which are reared in darkness and secrecy can not grow high and strong, and that common sense is the best assurance of efficiency and justice in the tariff.

Mr. Chairman, I am here holding a commission from the people of one of the greatest industrial districts of this country and of the world. In view of that fact, I desire to make a statement of the wishes of the people of my district regarding this tariff legislation. I promise you it will not be a repetition of desires you have had dinned into your ears unceasingly in the past. I shall not attempt to speak for any other interest save that of the common people, by whose command I am here.

In my district are located some of the greatest industrial establishments of the world. They have given the district the name of "workshop of the world." But let me tell you that the greatest claim of the district to consideration at your hands is not in the workshops but in the workers, not the machines but the machinists, not the buildings but the builders, not the tools but the toilers. In those giant establishments armies of men and women toil, and they are producing daily wealth greater than was dreamed by fairy tale writers of old. Their brain and brawn unite to pour out with lavish hand the countless products that make for greater comfort and should make for a happier humanity. And over that army of workers, greater than any that ever went forth in the annals of war, there floats a nobler banner and on it the words are wrought "for service."

I am here to represent them, the real manufacturers, those who take the ragged, raw material out of the field and mine, and in the sweat of their brows transform it into products of usefulness. They are the miracle workers, who handle the ore through its processes and make the iron and steel to serve the purposes of mankind. Theirs is the real work of manufacturing, and only when their tasks are finished do we have the completed products which are so highly regarded in statistics and in laws.

I speak for them and they deserve representation far beyond my ability to give, for they and those whose interests are identical with theirs make up the bone and sinew of this Nation, the masses of the people, upon whom alone the hope for the future rests. But I am responsible for presenting their cause as best I may, and in doing that I tell you that the time has come to deal with facts, not political theories. The people I represent care less than nothing for party labels and war crys. They do care everything for securing equality of opportunity, equal rights to every man.

The people believe in protection, honest protection, but they believe in it as a principle, not as a privilege. They are through with meaningless partisan appeals, fashioned for deception. They have abandoned the false pretense that the process of making millionaires by legislation justifies suffering and misery on the part of the many. They have decided for themselves that prosperity does not consist in swollen fortunes for a few, while the many lack the comforts of life. They will not even be satisfied to see one section of this Nation prosper at the expense of all the rest of the people. They believe that under present conditions an excessive tariff which fosters monopoly and shuts out all competition is no more protection than free trade, since it lowers the standard of American wages by reducing their purchasing power.

The people want an equalization of the cost of labor here and abroad, but they will not tolerate a situation where, under cover of that principle, a tariff is levied many times higher than the entire labor cost entering into a product. I am here to tell you that the people will no longer stand for the betrayal of the principle of honest protection by those who claim to be its chiefest apostles. In proof of that I might point you to the fact so evident here to-day that the majority of those apostles, victors in a hundred fights, have made their last sad journey from Leipsic to Waterloo. And it will profit those who survive to remember that the dangers to honest protection do not come from those who desire to remedy existing evils, but from those who insist on injustice and disregard of the right, deception, and special privileges to the few at the expense of the many. [Applause.]

The people make but one request in this matter of tariff legislation. They ask justice, and they are determined to secure it. They demand that the tariff shall be so adjusted that its benefits will be equally bestowed upon all the people of this Nation and not upon a class. The first question that should be considered by those who are to make tariff laws is, "Can justice be secured through the old methods of tariff making, or does that aim demand the adoption of a new and better method?"

If the present system is satisfactory and has met the requirements of justice, then the demand for another method has no claim whatever to consideration. But if experience shows that the demands of justice have not been met in the past, then the claims of another method deserve full investigation.

The history of tariff legislation in this country shows that succeeding laws have been jumbles of absurdities based on guesswork and logrolling, and that they have utterly failed to satisfy the justice and humanity of the American people. Almost the first business of the First Congress, assembled under the Constitution, was the consideration of a tariff bill. It was presented by James Madison, who urged its passage solely on the ground of remedying the "notorious deficiency in our Treasury." No attention was paid to the future effects of the measure, and the fact that the very men who secured its passage later became bitter opponents of the protective principle shows that they regarded it simply as an emergency measure in which the exigency of the occasion excused many defects.

From that day until this, a period of 125 years, the tariff question had been the puzzling problem of the Nation. Two hundred and sixty-one separate tariff laws have been enacted, and if all the hearings, investigations, and testimonies were published and collected the volumes would fill an immense library.

Public men of great renown have shifted from one side to the other of the question. Webster and Calhoun, in notable speeches in the United States Senate, have at different times favored each side as they followed the demand of their Commonwealths. Nullification measures have been passed by sovereign States in their indignation against tariff measures. Compromises have been necessary to avert civil strife; depressions and financial crises have followed both high tariff and low tariff acts based on limited information; administrations have been changed and parties cast from authority while the opposition party was elevated to power, and still in spite of all this the same system of tariff making has persisted to the dissatisfaction and anger of the people.

Every tariff revision in recent years has meant disaster for the party responsible. President Cleveland led the forces of Democracy to a revision, and the voters could scarcely wait until the election to show their fury. President Harrison revised the tariff, and the Republican Party was retired from power forthwith. President McKinley escaped the same fate only through a foreign war, and President Taft's unlucky revision is too fresh in our memories to need recalling, or, if it needs recalling, a glance at the White House and the membership of this body should be sufficient. It is to be remarked also that President Wilson will not profit by their example, but insists on following the same haphazard method so often rejected by the people, and there is little room to doubt but that history will repeat itself when the people give their decision.

The fact of the matter is, and only the veriest pauper of observation fails to see it, that acting through the old system of tariff making we are as far from a permanent and satisfactory solution of this perplexing issue as we were when Madison introduced the first tariff bill into Congress.

Under such circumstances it is assuredly the part of wisdom to determine why no solution has been reached, and the reason is not hard to find. Every tariff act passed thus far has been framed on limited information and through political and partisan compromise. The adjustment of the tariff schedules to the tariff policy of the Nation is a technical problem. It affects every man, woman, and child through commerce and industry, and demands a complete accurate and impartial knowledge of all the essential facts relating to the industries affected.

To secure that knowledge it is imperative that Congress have at its service a permanent body of trained and impartial experts to secure the vast amount of technical and statistical data needed for the legislation which is to vitally affect many and diverse interests. For that reason the Progressive plan for the creation of such a commission meets the urgent need, and the history of the past upholds the Progressive's contention that it is the only solution of a problem which has vexed the Nation from its foundation. It is the only solution which does away with the two factors which have prevented satisfactory and just tariff legislation in the past, insufficient information and legislative logrolling.

Judging from the past, it becomes evident that the impartial, nonpartisan tariff commission is not only necessary to produce symmetry and completeness, but it is absolutely imperative to end the haphazard, juggling methods of tariff making which have made the tariff a cause of disturbance in trade and production and a source of injury to the public welfare. [Applause.]

But while the historian looks only at yesterday the student of events looks at to-day. There is no real patriotism in public or in private life except that which exerts itself for all the people. There is no real statesmanship except that which stands ready to meet the conditions of the present and for sacrifice, if need be, in behalf of a just and righteous effort for the common good.

I am not here as a doctrinaire on either side of the tariff question. I consider that Congress should deal with things as they are to-day, that its measures should be adapted to the present situation, regardless of theories of the past. The tariff question is simply a question of meeting the needs of to-day justly and equitably and in a manner which will promote the common welfare. From that viewpoint the creation of a tariff commission is a necessity, for conditions are such that an adequate and just method of dealing with them is not only a wise measure but a patriotic duty.

I maintain that a fair and conscientious judgment of the result of the excessive protection of the present tariff law must convince one that some change is absolutely necessary. The people at large have made up their minds to that at least, but only because they have become convinced that the excessive rates imposed on many articles force the public to pay excessive prices for the wants and requirements of everyday life.

I said before that I come from the workshop of the world, and yet I am forced to say that in that workshop, with a production that staggers the imagination, the task of making a livelihood is an increasingly difficult one. Each year makes production cheaper and easier through new methods, but each year sees in the ranks of the army of producers more gaunt figures, hungry men and women, and children with the marks of premature age imprinted upon their countenances. Often the statistics of our great industries would seem to give the impression that the employees are simply so many producing machines, but they can not be so regarded. They are human beings with loved ones to protect, and they have hearts and minds as well as hands. They are awake to conditions and they must be taken into consideration by the lawmakers of this Nation. They have the same needs and hopes and fears as the captains of industry who sometimes seem to scarcely know of their existence.

These citizens of America are asking nothing but what is fair and just, and they will be satisfied with nothing less. They want no special privileges and undue advantages; all they ask is justice and the commonest kind of justice at that. They do not ask charity, they ask what is due them. They ask one hundred cents' value for every dollar expended—no more and no less.

What is their condition to-day? They go forth in the morning, taking the only thing they have to sell—their labor—and they sell it in the market for whatever the market will give. They are anxious to labor arduously if they may secure for themselves and their families the livelihood they deserve. They work long and skilfully and produce abundantly. But somehow, through processes they could not see, but whose mysteries they better understand to-day, they find their incomes insufficient to meet their absolutely necessary expenses. Instead of abundance, there is scarcity in their homes; instead of some leisure to develop a full, rounded life, they find themselves tied to a deadly routine of hopelessness, with its toll of blighting toil and fatigue. While selling their commodity in a market place for what it will bring, they pay an unseen tax collector a tribute on everything they buy.

Those are actual conditions, and I defy any man to successfully deny them. Pennsylvania and other industrial States have been held up as States which profit most from high protection; but let me say that in no other States in the Union has the policy of honest protection been more shamefully abused. In them we have seen competition excluded from abroad by a towering tariff wall, behind which home manufacturers combined into giant trusts and throttled domestic competition. I do not maintain that excessive tariff has been the only factor, but it has had a part in producing such a condition. Following that condition we have seen plants reduced in number and workmen thrown out of employment in order to curtail production and maintain high prices. We have seen small concerns crushed out of existence with ruthless power, and then that augmented force turned just as ruthlessly against all combinations of workmen who desired the right of collective bargaining. We have seen American labor getting decent wages and humane hours, not in the ultraprotected industries, but in the nonprotected industries which are not in any fashion subsidized in the name of labor. We have seen the necessaries of life soaring upward far beyond the power of wages to follow. We have seen men trying to work for ordinary wages when the prices of life's needs were extraordinarily high, and the result has been that life itself is almost a luxury.

We have seen business men, striving to serve the wants of a community in honest fashion, pilloried by a resistless power that crushed out their independence and dictated the terms on which they should do business. We have seen the foreign-labor competition, so greatly decried by ultraprotectionists, brought to our doors to supplant American labor at lower wage levels. We have seen the mills and mines manned with foreign workmen in increasing numbers until they form the large majority of the employees in many industries. We have seen, as the result of such a situation, the tramping of the sullen hordes of anarchy, with their strange banners and alien cries of hate and destruction, forming a distinct menace to free institutions.

The people have seen all this and more, and with the truth staring them in the face they have made up their minds that the day of excessively high tariffs for the products of great combinations is over. The American public will no longer bow to a big business which pays enormous dividends on watered stock and less than a living wage to those who turn out its products. They have decided once and for all that the tariff is not a matter of political expediency, not a commodity with which to bargain for political preferment, but a living, vital fact which concerns every individual and which must be dealt with in a spirit of justice and equality. The people believe also that juggling with the tariff will not serve as a club over manufacturers to keep them from dishonesty and greed and inhumanity. They believe in direct and fundamental remedies to prevent unscrupulous employers from grinding down the wages of labor and imposing upon the consuming public. Something more than the sword of Damocles in the shape of a tariff revision is needed to protect wage earners and the public against the conscienceless cunning of strong-armed lust for gain. Those remedies must be adopted, for the evils of to-day will not be dealt with and met through a political-jobbery tariff, handled as a partisan question, with the barter and sale of the market place.

I am under no illusions as to the possibilities that lie within this Underwood tariff bill. I do not believe any finite mind can see into the future with a gaze sufficiently searching to know the results of its passage. It has been written in hasty manner, and every schedule contains mysteries which no one understands, not even the men who put them there. It has in reality been passed in a secret binding caucus, with all the evasions which such a method makes inevitable. It is a leap in the dark, but after all the consequences of that leap must be charged to the very interests who have in the past scorned the demands of the people and scoffed at their prayers for relief. Through a period of many years the great protected industries of this country have built up a system of haphazard, reckless tariff legislation, because through it they secured golden privileges. They profited through the betrayal of the promises of the Republican Party, which passed a tariff law of suicidal folly and brazen treachery. The great interests of the country, which might have stood for a fair and impartial tariff commission in the past, did not want justice and a square deal to all; they should not complain to-day if they suffer from the system they themselves created. They are simply reaping what they sowed and the harvest was as certain as the seed time.

I know well that I am speaking new and strange doctrine from my district, but I am voicing the desires of the common people of all parties and creeds, and to them alone I am responsible for my actions. I know the probable results of any action which opposes the powers that have profited by ultra-protection, and that when they could no longer trust to their special privileges being supported by the people, have deliberately organized a vast political machine to secure unjust advantages. I know the tactics used to discredit and disgrace, the degrees of baseness, the money poured out like water, the falsehoods circulated in controlled mediums.

I know all that and I accept it. I could not do otherwise and be true to those who have trusted me. I have learned, too, in my brief life that it is far better to accept the gall of defeat than to wear a crown of victory purchased at the price of treason to the people and their interests.

I believe that the tariff is fundamentally a moral question and that it will never be settled until it is settled right. The Underwood bill does not settle the question right, and I am firm in the belief that it will be as conclusive evidence as the other measures of the past—that only in a just, nonpartisan, impartial tariff commission can justice be secured. It will show that such a solution of this problem is imperative because of the eternal wrangle between the protected interests and the people which the present system makes inevitable. The creation of the tariff commission will be the enthronement of a principle of right and not a sordid issue between classes of citizens. It should be adopted because it is the requirement of an enlightened and progressive era in American development. It derives its strength not from the promises that it will give special privileges to a part, but that it is necessary for the good of all. It demands adoption as a matter of straightforward business policy, not only because it is right but because nothing else will meet the demands of common justice. It would not destroy the principle of protection but would let the light in on its character and on each of its countless ramifications. If the principle can not stand the light of truth, the sooner it is destroyed the better. If it is a policy that means advancement of the common welfare, the truth can not hinder, but will further its success and perpetuate its advantages.

For myself, I am willing to have my motives assailed and be execrated by every holder of special privilege, every preyer upon the poor, every drab of journalism, and every parasite of politics, if I may have the supreme pleasure of standing for the interests of those who earn an honest living in the sweat of their brows, and ask only a square deal and no favors. They make up this great Nation and give it riches and greatness. They deserve at the very least that they should eat their honestly earned daily bread with the bitterness of injustice taken from it. They deserve that and they will never rest until they have secured it. This vexing tariff question will be settled and it will be settled right. For, while the historian looks only at yesterday and the student of events only at to-day, the patriot, with faith in America, pays due regard to both and considers also to-morrow. Some one has said that "Justice is the end and aim of government. It always has been pursued and always will be pursued until it be attained or until liberty be lost in the pursuit." I would omit the last clause of that quotation, for I am firm in the faith that justice will be secured in this Nation of ours.

The new type of American citizenship is asking legislation for the common good and his fight is not to secure privileges for himself but to keep others from securing privileges which would injure the general welfare. He stands squarely against the standpatism of stagnation and also the radicalism of indiscriminating destruction. He wants progress along fair and just lines, and I believe that he will hold to that purpose through all changes of parties and political organizations with no abating of heart or hope until he has conquered all obstacles and secured the most priceless boon possible to mankind—justice and equal opportunity for every man, woman, and little child.

And that goal will be secured in the tariff, not through a juggling, logrolling system which produces a tariff for special interests, with too much or too little protection by chance, but through a better and more just method, which shall produce a tariff for all the people.

Gentlemen, I thank you for your courtesy. [Applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, for the fifth time in a generation the prosperity of the Nation and the fate of political parties hang on the drafting and enactment of tariff legislation. In the light of the far-reaching effect, economic and industrial, sociological and political, of past revisions, the occasion is one of profound concern for all of the American people and of grave responsibility for those in position to write their views into law.

You of the Democratic household of faith have complete control under the great dome and at the White House; the responsibility is therefore wholly yours. We on this side may and will protest. It is our duty to criticize wherein we believe criticism is justified. We may even indulge in prophecy, but we do not cherish the hope or harbor the expectation that our protests, our criticisms, or our prophecies will avail in changing in the slightest degree the plan or scope of your determination. What is to be will be yours for better or for worse, so far as praise or blame shall attach and follow. Viewing your legislation as we do, our profound regret with regard to it arises from the fact that while you alone are responsible the evil effects we anticipate can not be confined to you, or those who agree with you, but will fall as a deadly blight upon the whole body of our people.

FAVORABLE CONDITIONS.

You have entered upon a revision of the tariff schedules under the most fortuitous circumstances and conditions that ever surrounded or accompanied a similar undertaking. You have the exceeding good fortune that your revision occurs at a time of unexampled prosperity. Whatever else may be said of Republican tariff legislation this no man can gainsay, that under it, whether by reason of it or in spite of it must remain a matter of opinion, the industries of the Nation have grown and prospered at a rate and to a degree unparalleled in the world's history. Under our legislation there has been a continuous and unchecked advance in the modes and standards of living, a steady shortening of the hours and increase in the rewards of labor, a marvelous prosperity widely diffused and very generally enjoyed. Upon the very crest of this ceaselessly advancing wave of human betterment with all of the advantages of its mighty momentum; with a Treasury, in spite of your enormous appropriations, well stocked; with the granaries of the Nation still laden with the fruits of an unprecedented harvest and every prospect for another fruitful year, you enter upon your work. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Furthermore you are fortunate beyond all past experience in the attitude of the people and of the press toward your enterprise. Notwithstanding the fears and the misgivings with which a large portion of our people view your determination to write upon the statute books your widely conflicting, but generally radical, declarations relative to the tariff there is a well-nigh universal determination, expressed and apparent on every hand, to await with philosophical resignation the outcome of your labors and the practical effects of your handiwork. No considerable number of men, no important influences, so far as I know, have attempted or contemplated any action that shall unfairly prejudice in advance the effect of your schedules.

No organized effort has been or is likely to be made, as has been so frequently our experience in the past, for purely selfish or partisan purposes to create an atmosphere of hostility and distrust. No one is disposed to arouse anger and resentment through misleading, untruthful, or purely captious and carping criticism of your schedules or their probable effect. In spite of unwarranted and ungracious assertions to the contrary by some high in your councils, there is no evidence in any quarter of any concerted effort to create panic, but rather an abundance of proof of a determination on the part of powerful influences in the field of capital and labor to preserve normal and favorable conditions pending the enactment and trial of your legislation.

YOUR ADVANTAGES.

To fully realize the advantage which you enjoy under present conditions we have but to recall the wicked assaults upon the McKinley bill, during and subsequent to the period of its enactment, or the scurvy tricks and mendacious statements which characterized the campaign which immediately followed. We have only to compare present conditions with those which obtained when the Dingley bill became a law; the pressing demand for immediate revenue to replenish a treasury your legislation and administration had depleted; the imperative necessity for heroic remedies for the restoration of industries your policies had prostrated, and to bring back a prosperity you had driven from our own to foreign shores.

Coming down to later times within our immediate recollection, we vividly recall the unfortunate conditions which accompanied the enactment of the Payne bill; the atmosphere of suspicion and hypercriticism which surrounded it on all sides during the period of its gestation; the hostile attitude of a powerful press; the merciless assaults upon its faults and the conscienceless misrepresentation of the tenor and probable effect of many of its schedules. From these staggering handicaps which have burdened our past revisions, exaggerating their faults, minimizing their virtues, creating prejudices which abundance of revenue, favorable trade balances, or general prosperity could never wholly remove, you are fortunately free. Your success or failure therefore will depend wholly upon the character of your legislation and its effect upon the Nation and its people.

YOUR HANDICAPS.

On the other hand, you are embarrassed by what you did a year ago when, without responsibility and with the announced hope of "putting the President in a hole," you played partisan politics with the tariff and introduced and passed bills whose schedules, by a process of political somersaulting, you now largely repudiate. Wholly through your own fault, you are without accurate information on which to base schedules by reason of your refusal to retain the services or accept the findings of a capable and nonpartisan Tariff Board. The scandalously brief period given for the presentation of views before your committee, a few moments, in many cases, to industries of vast extent and great importance, the widespread opinion that no argument not in harmony with your declared purpose would have any weight or influence with you, had the effect of deterring those engaged in many important lines of endeavor from attempting to speak for their industries and enterprises. Finally you were and are handicapped by the utter lack of any clearly defined or definitely announced policy of tariff revision. The result of all this is that the product of your labors, compromises, and guesses is neither fiscal fish, flesh, nor fowl, neither free trade, tariff for revenue, nor for protection, but an undigested mess and mixture of them all, with free trade, present or prospective, predominating.

COMMITTEE NOT WHOLLY TO BLAME.

The Democratic members of the committee who framed this measure and rammed it down the throats of their protesting colleagues accomplished their purpose not by arguments addressed to your judgment but by artful appeals for support for that coordinate branch of the Government which controls the shaking of the plum tree. Whether it was loyalty to the titular head of the party or a lively sense of favors to come which most prevailed in persuading many of you, contrary to your judgment as to the best interests of your constituents, I shall leave it to them to decide, with the conviction that neither excuse will save you from the wrath to come. [Applause on the Republican side.]

But these gentlemen who framed the measure and compelled you to accept it are not wholly to blame because it is what it is, for with a platform declaration that protective tariffs are unconstitutional, with a presidential declaration that no legitimate industry should suffer, with the Underwood patented "competitive" tariff, and the ancient Democratic shiboleth of free trade, all to reconcile, the wonder is that the committee did not do worse, if, indeed, that were possible.

Had the free traders in your party been able to prevail in all things the result could not have been much, if any, more disastrous, for the need of revenue would have stayed their hand, and they would, at least, have been consistent enough not to place a duty on the raw material of an industry the finished product of which went to the free list, as you have done in numerous instances. Had the tariff for revenue idea prevailed the total destruction which now impends over the sheep-raising, the sugar-growing, and other industries of the country might have been in a measure averted. Had the Underwood idea of a "competitive" tariff been carried out in good faith and with full information many of our industries which now face ruin might have been partly saved, for while the author of that copyrighted form of tariff does not know it, a competitive tariff fairly interpreted is but another name for a tariff measuring the difference in cost of production at home and abroad. Had the assurance of President Wilson, given during the campaign, that no legitimate industry had anything to fear from Democratic tariff revision, been fulfilled great enterprises of the farm and ranch, the mill, mine, and factory would not now be under sentence of destruction through Democratic tariff legislation.

DEADLY AS A WHOLE, UNSOUND IN DETAIL.

The deadly character of this tariff mixture is the inevitable result of an uncanny combination of every evil form of Democratic heresy. As certain elements but mildly dangerous in themselves become, in combination, destructive and deadly to a superlative degree, so these various Democratic tariff heresies in evil combination become an agency of measureless potentiality for harm. Not only is the measure fundamentally wrong in principle or lack of principle, but it bears numberless evidences of unsound and ill-considered action in the casting and framing of schedules. The general substitution of ad valorem for specific duties is squarely in conflict with the lessons of our own experience and directly contrary to the present practice of those countries, like Germany, which have made the most thorough and scientific study of tariff questions. This is certain to aid and encourage fraud and lead to such serious and general undervaluation as to render rates, at best too low, still lower in their actual application. The placing of the same or a higher rate on the raw material of a process or industry than on the advanced or finished product has no counterpart in any tariff legislation with which I am familiar and will be disastrous to industries. In various schedules of the bill a great variety of articles widely differing in the percentage of labor cost are grouped under one head with the same rate. This is evidence either of profound ignorance of the elementary principles of tariff making or of utter indifference as to the effect of schedules on American labor and enterprise. Of necessity such rates are either too low to give the American producer any chance on any of the articles or else too high on some and too low on others.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MONDELL. I would be glad to do so, but I have only an hour and I desire to complete what I have in mind to say.

Mr. BARTLETT. It is just a question with reference to the statement the gentleman made—that no tariff bill but this ever permitted raw material to come here free and taxed the manufactured product.

Mr. MONDELL. That is not exactly what I said; but no tariff bill, I am sure, that was ever framed and introduced anywhere on the face of the earth ever did that to the extent that this bill does.

Mr. BARTLETT. Oh.

Mr. MONDELL. And I know of no former tariff legislation that ever did that, except possibly in a few very rare and unimportant instances. In this case it runs through your entire bill. If there is any principle at all to your bill—which I very much doubt after a careful consideration of it—that would seem to be it. You not only paralyze the industries of the country by your rates, but for fear you should have left some industry in position to keep its head above your engulfing tide of free trade you propose to handicap the American producer, the American manufacturer, over and above any possible handicap that lower wages paid on the other side might bring. [Applause on the Republican side.] For fear there should be some lingering hope that some industry somewhere might survive you have introduced this principle, this theory, whatever you may call it, this lack of principle which runs all through your bill, through which you place on the free list finished products the raw materials of which are taxed. That alone and without reference to any other proposition in the bill justifies any man who believes in intelligent tariff revision, high or low, in voting against the measure.

"NEAR" PROTECTION AND CONFISCATION.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has at intervals confessed himself a near protectionist by seeking to apply his so-called competitive-tariff theory in such manner as to give the American producer at least a fighting chance in his home market, and a few of the rates he fixed may possibly measurably cover the difference in cost of production here and abroad.

In so far as this has been done, we welcome such recognition of the virtues of the protective principle. How utterly inconsistent with this attitude is the ruthless slaughter of enterprises of present vast extent and great future promise, like the sugar and wool and woolen industries.

President Wilson is quoted in the papers as having stated to newspaper men that if any sugar factories closed by reason of free sugar it would only be for effect, and they would soon resume. I hope the President did not say that. It is bad enough to have the President and his party take the position that the interests of the majority demand the immolation on the altar of the public good of great and growing industries, but it is infinitely worse if, in sentencing great industries to extinction and fixing the date of execution, the claim is made by high official authority that when the mandate is carried out it will be a case of suicide.

Anyone who has given the subject any consideration knows that under free sugar practically no sugar cane or sugar beets for sugar-making purposes will be grown. A few, perhaps a half dozen at most, of over 75 beet-sugar factories, costing from a half to a million dollars each, might struggle along for a few years, trying to survive on a local market. It is certain no new factories would be built, and in a few years at the most the beet-sugar industry would be but a memory of the constructive character of Republican and the destructive character of Democratic policies. The effect on the cane-sugar industry would be equally destructive. If you Democrats, in your zeal to accomplish a possible saving on the national sugar bill of a few cents per person per annum, are willing to confiscate millions of property in mills and factories and millions more in the value of farms; if you are content to take from tens of thousands of farmers the market for their best and perhaps only profitable crop, you at least should have the grace to do it without adding insult to injury.

The factories manufacturing sugar from American beets and cane represent an investment of over $100,000,000. This will be an almost total loss, for the factories can not be used for any other purpose. The value of the million acres now planted to beets and cane will be reduced by many millions of dollars; a crop which now brings the farmer $50,000,000 annually will be lost to him—all this in the interest of the customs-defrauding Sugar Trust and the foreign combine, which two years ago, after the American sugar crop was sold, aided the Refiners' Trust to boost the price of sugar 2 cents.

FREE WOOL DESTRUCTIVE.

Free wool means loss and depression to our entire sheep and wool industry and complete destruction to the most important part of the industry, that of merino and mixed-blood sheep. No man who knows enough about the industry to speak intelligently about it will deny the truth of this general proposition.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] admitted that the 20 per cent duty proposed by his bill of last year would not save the sheep industry of the Ohio Valley. He and his party coolly suggest that if the industry don't pay under free trade it should be thrown into the scrap heap and something else substituted for it. In half a dozen intermountain States the sheep decreased over half in number in three years under the Wilson bill, and even more in value; and a few years more of free trade would have virtually wiped out the industry. During that same period the sheep of the country decreased 15,000,000 in number and the wool clip 90,000,000 pounds, a loss of at least $75,000,000 to the industry.

Not content with having brought great loss on the American woolgrowers by continual agitation of the tariff, the gentlemen on the other side now use present low wool prices, for which they are largely responsible, as an argument for making them still lower under free trade. The fact is, however, that while prices have been greatly depressed during this tariff agitation actual comparison of the London and Boston prices of identical wools, made within the past few months, show a difference in favor of the American grower by reason of the present tariff of from 5½ to 7½ cents a pound. Take that amount from the farmers' and flockmasters' price and one does not need to be a prophet to foresee what will happen.

We are informed that this bill is intended to reduce the cost of living. Have our Democratic friends forgotten that the cleanest, sweetest meat in the world lies under the wool of the American sheep, especially the mountain sheep? How do you propose to make up for this loss of meat supply? I note that you have separated the sheep from the goats, and, contrary to scriptural injunction, you abandon the sheep and protect the goats. Is it your idea to give the people goat meat instead of mutton on the theory that they will be lucky to get any meat at all under a Democratic administration? The meat of a billy goat will unquestionably give more aroma of a kind to Democratic free-trade soup kitchens than that of a merino lamb. If this is not the reason for the favor you extend the goat, is it because they raise goats in Texas and sheep in Ohio? You put a 10 per cent duty on the wheat of Minnesota, none on her flour, and 33⅓ per cent protection upon the rice of Louisiana and Texas. You do not believe in protection, you say, and you have left but tattered fragments of it in this bill except that you protect Texas on rice and the hair of the goat, and in New Jersey, which has furnished us with a President, on the silk industry; also a few favored localities where they manufacture automobiles.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield to just one question?

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will be brief.

Mr. BARTLETT. Does not the gentleman think it is as fair to the cotton raisers of the South to have their cotton bagging free and untaxed as that the great grain raisers of the West should have their binding twine free? Does not he think that is equally fair and just?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not think the proposition of free bagging for one industry alone and confined to that industry is fair or equitable, whether it be the industry of the raising of cotton or anything else. If it be held to be proper to place all bagging for all purposes on the free list there may be at least an argument for it, but to place on the free list bagging which is used only for the one purpose, in one industry, is neither fair nor equitable. As to other bagging, the gentleman has so arranged it in the schedule that there is not a particle of protection for the American manufacturer of bagging against the miserable, underpaid Hindu labor that produces it in India.

Mr. BARTLETT. There ought to be——

Mr. MONDELL. Why, in the philosophy of the gentleman, no. He does not believe, apparently, that any American labor ought to be protected from the underfed and the underpaid and the miserably housed and the half-nourished coolie of the East.

Mr. BARTLETT. It is an article made in America by a trust, and that trust not long ago shut out its own labor by not paying them sufficient wages.

Mr. MONDELL. It is very easy for the gentleman to talk about trusts as an excuse for any Democratic iniquity.

Mr. BARTLETT. I can establish my statement by proof.

Mr. MONDELL. It is very easy to attempt to answer every question concerning the schedules of this bill by talking about trusts. It reminds me of an argument they used to make down in the gentleman's country, which I hope they do not use any longer. I asked a gentleman once how it was that a man advocating certain policies could come from a certain region if those policies were discussed there. He said, "Do not fool yourself. They do not discuss those policies. They shout 'Nigger domination'; that settles it."

Now, the gentleman, whenever a question is raised as to any of the schedules in this bill, will shout "Trust." [Laughter.] Aye, that has been a potent slogan in the past, and there has been some reason for it, but when, under Democratic legislation, the soup houses are filled with thousands of American citizens who can not secure employment, when mills and factories are closed, when the farmer is compelled to sell his product for less than it costs to produce it, the gentleman will not be able to fool the people by continually referring every proposition to the trusts. [Applause on the Republican side.] The gentleman is like the doctor who could not cure a particular ailment with which a patient was afflicted, but he was willing to throw him into fits, because he thought he could cure the fits.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman permit just one word?

Mr. MONDELL. I am sorry I have not the time, if I am to conclude in the time given me.

Mr. BARTLETT. Just a word.

I have not made the statement concerning the Bagging Trust without full information. It appears in the evidence before the Payne Ways and Means Committee, in 1909, that had hearings on the tariff bill of that year——

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman can make a speech as long as he pleases about that trust or any other trust. I am no more in favor of trusts than he is. This fact remains, that in India, which is the principal competitor of American bagging manufacturers, the average wage is less than one-tenth of what it is in the United States, and the gentleman can not answer that proposition by talking about trusts. I am as much against trusts and combinations in restraint of trade as he is, and that is why I do not propose to join in a proposition to paralyze the great American farm industry in sugar beets and sugar cane in order to help the law-breaking Sugar Trust to throttle the American people by controlling the price of sugar. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I can not better express my views in regard to the attitude of the Democratic Party on the sheep and wool question than by quoting an extract from a speech I made in the House on June 12, 1911, as follows:

In peace the products of the flocks of our country add to our comfort and enjoyment and in war they furnish us with material for clothing and blankets for the soldiers in the field, without which we would be almost as helpless in the face of an enemy in a long and arduous campaign as we would be without ammunition for our guns. But for the sheep and wool industry we would in time of peace be shorn of many luxuries and comforts and in time of war we would be naked to our enemies. Yet this is the industry, ancient and honorable, useful and necessary, producing wealth from waste, employing hundreds of thousands of men, from the shepherds on the plains to the operatives in the mills, which the Democratic Party does not consider entitled to any consideration as to its present status or future prospects in the framing of a tariff bill.

WHO IS TO BE BENEFITED?

As I have conned the schedules of this bill my wonder has increased as to what occupations and industries its framers expected would remain open to American labor and industry after its schedules got into full swing. The rates are so low on manufactured products of many kinds and great volume as to threaten the employment of numberless mill and factory workers. That our people will not be able to overcome the handicap which the measure places on American enterprise in the assembling and fabrication of a vast variety of articles, without a reduction in wages, is patent to anyone having an elementary knowledge of conditions. It is true that a few favored lines of manufacture, like those of silks and automobiles, for instance, are left with adequate protection, but these are the rare exceptions.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MONDELL. Just a question.

Mr. BARTLETT. Does not the gentleman think that automobiles and silks above all things ought to be taxed?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, everything in this world is comparative. There are mighty few American working girls—God bless them, honest, virtuous, and courageous—there are mighty few of them who under a Republican administration can not afford a Sunday dress of silk, thank God. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BARTLETT. Why, this bill reduces the tax on silks below what it is in the Payne bill.

Mr. MONDELL. It reduces the duty on silks mighty little, much less than it will reduce the wages and the opportunities for employment of the working girl. But I did not refer to these particular rates of duty with a view of contending that they were or were not reasonably protective. I called attention to them to illustrate the illogical, inequitable, lopsided, limping, hobble-skirted character of your legislation. You leave a 10 per cent duty on wheat, but flour, the product of wheat, you place on the free list. Cattle and sheep are dutiable; beef and mutton are on the free list. You claim the cotton planter is entitled to free bagging and free cotton ties because cotton is on the free list, but you place wool on the free list; and while you do not protect the American manufacturer of such bagging as the woolgrower uses, you do retain a 30 per cent duty on it, as you do on practically everything the woolgrower uses in his business. You deprive the woolgrower of all protection, but you place a duty on tops, the first finished product of the wool, so high as to give the larger woolen manufacturers, whom you have been berating for years, a virtual monopoly. You have been talking incessantly about making the poor man's clothing cheaper, and yet you have retained in your bill the most objectionable feature of present Schedule K by fixing a rate on cheap mixed goods of cotton and wool as though they were all wool. You have followed the good old Democratic doctrine of allowing our people to import rags and shoddy free; that is logical in a Democratic tariff bill, for rags will be all the style when your administration gets into full swing. I suppose you think it also logical to place a high rate, comparatively, on imported goods made largely of rags and shoddy. Taking into consideration the advantages which manufacturers secure in some instances under your bill through free raw material, the protective rates you have placed on some of their products are actually higher than under the Payne law. These are the details that condemn the bill; its utter lack of any foundation theory, its resultant iniquities, which would make it ridiculous if it were not tragic.

LOSS TO FARMERS AND STOCKMEN.

It can be said, without fear of successful contradiction, that no considerable portion of our people engaged in any form of agriculture or husbandry outside the cotton belt can escape serious loss and injury through the passage of this bill.

Free cotton ties, bagging, and press cloth may temporarily be of some slight value to the cotton planter, though that is doubtful, but certain it is that the sop of free agricultural machinery will not compensate the farmers, dairymen, flockmasters, and herdsmen of any part of the country for the cheapening of their products, which you hope to accomplish by allowing free or nearly free importations of like articles.

I presume that you gentlemen hope that the beet-sugar farmer, whose industry you propose to destroy, will be consoled by your assurance that if he had an opportunity to grow beets he might have the privilege of tending them with a German cultivator. No doubt you expect the Louisiana sugar planter to find compensation for the loss of his best crop in the promise that he may have the privilege of preparing his land for less profitable crops with a Belgian plow.

When our splendid merino and mixed-blood wool industry is destroyed you gentlemen, no doubt, hope to derive satisfaction from the fact that if we had sheep to shear we might buy Sheffield shears for that purpose free of duty. Should the lower prices for meats which you hope to secure by placing them on the free list be realized, no doubt you expect the farmer and stockman to be entirely satisfied with the assurance that you have attempted to give him cheaper hoes and prod poles.

In all human probability no American farmer will ever buy satisfactory farm machinery cheaper under your bill than he does now; therefore if the reduced prices of hay, grain, dairy products, fruits and vegetables, swine, sheep, and cattle which you have promised shall materialize, the loss will be wholly uncompensated by any corresponding gain. If, as a matter of fact, the placing of agricultural machinery on the free list were to reduce the price of such machinery by the small amount of the present low tariff, which, by the way, does not apply against England or any country which does not levy a tax against our farm machinery, the possible gain to the farmer would be but an infinitesimal fraction of his certain loss.

WHAT ARE LEGITIMATE INDUSTRIES?

Reading the schedules of your bill and recalling the assurance of President Wilson that no legitimate industry had anything to fear from Democratic tariff revision, one is challenged by the query, What is a legitimate industry?

Is that ancient agricultural and pastoral pursuit which first weaned men from savagery, the profession of the patriarchs of old, the occupation of those who as they watched their flocks by night received from the angel of the Lord the first tidings of the advent of the Savior of mankind, not a legitimate industry in the opinion of the Democratic President and Congress? And if so, why? Is the husbandry in the valley of the Ohio and the Rocky Mountain region of those gentle creatures, the scriptural type of innocence, which furnish the cheapest, the cleanest, and the juiciest of meats for the feeding of the people and the finest and strongest of golden fleece for the clothing of the Nation, not a legitimate enterprise? And if so, why?

Are the hundreds of millions of dollars invested in mills and factories for the production of cane and beet sugar not legitimate investments? Are the opportunities and employment offered to hundreds of thousands of American farmers and laborers in the growing of sugar cane and sugar beets not legitimate opportunities and employments? And if not, why? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from North Dakota?

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. From South Dakota.

Mr. MONDELL. For just a moment.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Has the gentleman seen any discussion in part of the hearings had before the Committee on Ways and Means between the gentleman from New York and some of the witnesses in regard to what is a legitimate American industry? I refer to the gentleman from New York, Mr. HARRISON.

Mr. MONDELL. I have not had that pleasure.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I think the logical purport of that was that a legitimate American industry is an industry that can sustain itself in this country in the face of all opposition from abroad without any protection. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; in other words, an industry that can maintain itself under a Democratic administration; and the only industry that can do that is the soup-house industry. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Only for a question. I regret I have not more time at my disposal.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Since the gentleman from North Dakota has referred to me in this matter, I will say to him that I do consider that in trying to maintain by tariff rates a tropical crop in a temperate zone, as, for example, Louisiana cane sugar, an attempt is made to maintain an illegitimate industry.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, with all due apologies to North Dakota for the mistake of having been credited twice to that State, as I have read those hearings the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] was practically to the effect that I stated that a legitimate American industry is an industry that is not to be harmed by the proposed Democratic revision of the tariff—that is, an industry that can thrive in this country without protection.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; and the statement just made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] satisfies me that no industry that requires any protection whatever is, in the opinion of the gentleman from New York, a legitimate industry, whether it be agricultural or industrial. That is what his proposition leads to, and while he may have, his party has not the courage to write a bill boldly declaring that policy, though they came near writing such a bill. There are others on that side who, like the gentleman from New York, are full-fledged free traders. There are few who have the courage to declare it; most of them prefer to leave the impression at home that, as far as the home industry was concerned, it was to be made an exception. If that had not been done, there would be many seats now held on that side filled by Republicans.

INJURY TO WEST AND PACIFIC SLOPE.

It is true the great West and Northwest had little representation on the Democratic committee which framed this bill, but is it possible that the members of that committee do not know of or care for the people or the industries of that fair and fertile portion of our land, the source of the grain and meat supply of the Nation?

If the committee had no regard for the vast products in wool and mutton, beef and wheat, sugar, and dairy products of that region, what about those on the Democratic side who were sent here by the people of that region to look after their interests? There is not a product of the agricultural or pastoral midwest, northwest, mountain west, or Pacific slope which is not either doomed or seriously menaced by this bill. Where are those Democrats from that region whose duty it is to guard their people and their enterprises? What have they to say in this hour of their people's peril?

A SURRENDER TARIFF.

Hailing from the West, as I do, it is perhaps natural that my attention should be particularly challenged by the menace this bill presents to the people of that region, but perhaps the most amazing thing about the bill is the fact that no industry or enterprise seems to have been important enough to be spared and none so insignificant as to escape. Great textile and metal industries have their rates cut to the bone. Perhaps that was to be expected from your past declarations, but a multitude of smaller industries—in regard to which the committee had little if any information, if we are to judge from the hearings—are put on the ragged edge or thrown overboard. Up and down the schedules rode the committee, apparently for all the world like a gang of drunken cowboys shooting up the town or a band of Moro fanatics running amuck. This is no revision; it is a smashing of the tariff, a complete surrender of our markets to foreigners. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Scattered about throughout the country in almost every Northern State, no doubt in many Southern States, are small shops, foundries, mills, and factories engaged in the manufacture, in a limited way, of a vast variety of articles, including knit, felt, and woven goods, special clothing, gloves and mittens, machine tools, special machinery, wooden and iron ware, household utensils, harness and saddles, sundries—none have escaped. The slogan of the Donnybrook fair, "Wherever you see a head, smash it," has been the shibboleth. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

BENEFITS THE PHILIPPINES, INJURES HAWAII AND PORTO RICO.

Not content with smashing schedules so as to give all the world the privilege of our great market free, or measurably so, our Democratic friends prepare to give the people of the Philippines unqualifiedly the free run of our market, not only for their own goods and products but for the goods of all the world shipped to us by way of the Philippines, provided such goods are Philippine in half their value. This amazing proposition practically annuls whatever temporary benefit might be derived from the reduced duty retained on sugar for three years and is as indefensible as a policy as it is impossible of honest administration. We are gravely assured that this plan to allow all the world to ship its goods here free through the Philippines is proper, because the "War Department suggested it."

The Democratic Party proposes, I understand, a policy of scuttle toward the Philippines, that we sever all connection with and obligations toward them, and you inaugurate this policy of surrender by giving them tariff benefits accorded no one else, not even our own people. This extraordinary proposition is carried in the same bill which contemplates the termination of our reciprocal benefits and obligations under our treaty with Cuba—the same bill through which we are to inflict great and lasting injury on our own territory and people in Hawaii and Porto Rico.

LOSS OF MARKETS AND REVENUE.

This measure surrenders the best markets in the world to foreigners without attempt or pretense of securing any trade advantages thereby. It will cause the loss of many millions of revenue, the payment of which is in the main no appreciable burden, and proposes to fill the gap in revenue by an inquisitorial personal tax.

Whatever our opinion may be of the wisdom of adopting in time of peace the English system of a national income tax, thus depriving the States of that source of revenue, I doubt if such a tax on earned incomes as low as $4,000 will prove profitable or popular, and when the tax is so drawn as to amount to triple taxation in many instances it becomes indefensibly inequitable in such cases.

WHO BENEFITED AND HOW.

But we are told that all the sacrifices of opportunity and enterprise this measure proposes are in the interest of the people. Is it possible that our Democratic friends, when they speak of the people, have only in mind the cotton planters, a few favored manufacturers, and the dwellers on the east side of New York? Do the cotton kings, those who dwell in the shadow of Tammany Hall, and a few favored manufacturers constitute the people in the opinion of the Democratic Party? [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] My friend from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] referred to it the other day as the policy of Dixie and Tammany against the balance of the country. I am glad to use his apt expression, giving him credit for it.

No doubt you have in mind also the so-called ultimate consumer, whose purchasing power does not depend in any wise upon the state of the industries of the country. There are a few such, no doubt, whose incomes being fixed beyond the power of trade or industrial conditions to disturb them, may be benefited by the conditions of low prices you hope to establish. Beyond these I can think of no one under the flag who can hope to benefit by your legislation.

On the other hand, the most optimistic among you can conjure up no legitimate industry, no opportunity of honest employment, which will be benefited or enlarged through your legislation. While many industries tremble in anticipation of the effect of your schedules, none anticipate more favorable conditions by reason of it. While labor in many lines is threatened with loss of employment or lowering of wages, no class of labor looks for better wages or more constant employment as a result of your action. The best that you can offer labor is that by reducing the rewards of the producers on the farms you may possibly temporarily better the conditions of the consumers of their product in the cities and towns.

THE BEST YOU CAN HOPE FOR.

This, then, is the best you can hope for, that by the destruction of certain industries, great and small, with great and permanent loss, the transfer of production from ours to foreign shores, and by the reduction of the rewards of the agricultural classes of our people you may bring some small benefit to a mythical class labeled the ultimate consumer.

Many men at one time and another in the world's history have followed as disappointing a phantom as you are now pursuing. Men have sought the alchemy that was to turn dross to gold; they have endeavored to secure perpetual motion; they have searched for a fountain of perpetual youth; they have looked for the pot of gold at the foot of the rainbow; and one and all their quests, their efforts, and their endeavors have been quite as sensible, reasonable, and logical as yours; they have all been bitterly disappointed, even as you will be. [Applause on the Republican side.]

DEMOCRATIC FAILURE.

Your failure will not be due to differences of individual opinion, marked as they are. It will not result from selfish efforts to secure local advantages and ignore the just claims of others, much as that will divide your councils. Neither will it come from lack of loyalty to party leaders or of disposition to accept their advice, for of those qualities you have displayed more than is good for your constituents or well for your country. Your trouble lies deeper than all these; it is elementary and fundamental. It arises from your failure to recognize or follow the truth, to establish a principle of action and stick to it.

Certain great truths and principles lie at the foundation of any successful fiscal policy for a country like ours. We have established here a condition and a standard of living, of education, of opportunity, of ambition above that of any other people. Nothing would be easier, if our people would stand it, than to bring about a lowering of those standards; but if we are to maintain them, if we are to raise them higher, if we are to make them all-pervading among our people, we can not, we must not, place our people on a plane as to their employment, as to the rewards for their labor and endeavor, with those who are content or compelled to accept and live under standards, conditions, and opportunities less favorable than ours. These are the plain, simple truths which must be recognized as the basis of tariff legislation. You refuse as a party to accept them; therefore you have not written in 50 years, and you will not in 50 more, a tariff law satisfactory to the American people.

REPUBLICAN TARIFF POLICY.

We have made some mistakes, but our principles are sound. We have profited by our errors and we will write the next tariff law that the American people will accept, for they will not accept yours. We have always assumed as the proper basis of legislation a tariff rate at which the American could pay and receive a higher wage than his foreign competitor and meet him on even terms. At one time as to many industries it was not especially material if the rate was somewhat above this point, but with the growth of combination, and of opportunity for combination, some abuses came, and as the opportunity for further and greater abuses existed the demagogue came also. We were blamed not only for the abuses which did exist but more for the opportunities for abuse which, the people were led to believe, existed in some of our schedules.

TARIFF COMMISSION.

As the necessity became apparent for schedules, which while affording our own people an opportunity to do the Nation's work gave no hiding place for monopoly, we adopted the plan and policy of securing accurate and scientific information as to the cost of production at home and abroad. In an interval of virtue the Democratic leaders accepted and approved the plan, only to follow evil counsel later to defeat it.

The result is that although the Tariff Board we were able to secure and retain for a short time did make a report on certain schedules no attention was paid to it in framing this bill. I am not surprised at that; I am surprised that holding the views you do the committee went through the idle and empty form of holding hearings.

In your philosophy, or sophistry, nothing that an American artisan, producer, or manufacturer could say touching the need of tariff rates to protect his labor or production could or did have any effect on your action. A table of imports and of home production, a schedule of rates calculated to increase the former and decrease the latter, a few orders from the White House modifying your plans, a secret caucus binding the souls and consciences of Democratic Members, and the thing was done. And the Lord have mercy upon us and upon all our people.

Mr. HARDY. Now will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. I want to ask the gentleman, if high protection has made such high wages in this country, why has it not produced high wages in Italy and Germany?

Mr. MONDELL. Protection has increased and maintained wages wherever as a policy it has been adopted. [Applause on the Republican side.] It has done that to a peculiar, unexampled, and extraordinary degree under the American flag. But I am thinking about these troubled gentlemen who, like my friend from Texas, want a duty on wool.

Mr. HARDY. Oh, the gentleman should not make that statement.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, the other gentleman from Texas, a number of gentlemen from Texas, who want a duty on wool. You can not have that, say your masters of the Ways and Means Committee, but they gave you a duty on rice, of which you grow some in Texas. It is hard to keep track of the various local protection fads of you gentlemen on the other side. Some of you want a duty on wool, some on sugar, while some of your real statesmen have been content with a duty on rice or peanuts. But you can not combine to secure what you ask for. Why? Because you have been teaching the doctrine that a man may stand for protection for his own district but he must be against the protection of industries in all other districts, and therefore they slaughter your industries in detail because you fight in detail.

Mr. HARDY. I would like to ask the gentleman if that is all the answer, all the reasons, he has to give why high protection has not increased wages in Italy?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Texas is going far afield. That is not strange when he becomes the champion of a bill that proposes to place the highly paid labor of America in unprotected competition with the pauper labor of Italy to which he refers. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes more to the gentleman from Wyoming.

EASY TO MISLEAD.

Mr. MONDELL. It is true the Democratic way is the easy way to do it, and it is in harmony with the easy way in which you have led many people to agree to give you a chance at the tariff. It does not require courage or statesmanship to appeal to human selfishness, to bring some people to applaud a plan which proposes in the name of virtue to deprive the people of one section of opportunities because another section does not happen to have that particular form of opportunity. It is easy to bring some people to believe that the prosperity others enjoy is in some way at their expense. It is not difficult to win applause and support, of a certain kind, on the promise to bring blessings to those to whom the appeal is made by carrying misery to others.

It is not impossible to prove that the protective policy has not established perfectly ideal conditions everywhere and among all people, particularly if one denies or ignores the glorious fact that under it conditions among our people, and especially among those who toil, are more favorable than in any other land and have grown steadily better. You have endeavored, and with some success, to make men believe that the better wages and opportunities our people enjoy are not due to protection but largely to organization, ignoring the fact that as no one has ever been able to squeeze blood from a turnip or make bread from stones, so no amount of organization can wring a living or adequate wage from an employment that does not pay, an enterprise from which there is no return. [Applause on the Republican side.]

SELFISH APPEALS FAIL.

Your appeals have been to localism, to sectionalism, to class consciousness, to selfishness, to cupidity, and while they have been, owing to our dissensions, temporarily successful, they must, in the nature of things, fail in the day of test. They have already failed with you. In the secret caucus you have held, numbers of you from time to time, fighting for your own section or for local industries, have hurled your salvos against the patronage-buttressed position of your temporary masters, the Ways and Means Committee. Again and again devoted bands, fighting for what you consider the interests of your constituents, have dashed yourselves against the barriers of party discipline, and all in vain. And yet there has not been a moment, since the bill was first submitted to caucus, when if all of you who have been fighting for perfectly proper and needful changes in schedules had combined you could not have saved the industries and employments of your people doomed or menaced by this bill. But you could not combine, because you were each pledged to the selfish rule of attempting to preserve prosperity in your own sections or industries regardless of the interests of other sections or industries.

COMING REPUBLICAN TRIUMPH.

From these scenes of party strife, of personal anguish among your membership, from the painful contemplation of the evil days certain to befall as the result of your legislation, I look forward to that not distant day, when the destructive and paralyzing effect of your legislation being painfully patent to all, the people will demand that you provide a tariff commission, which shall ascertain and report the facts on which to base a tariff, measuring the difference of cost of production at home and abroad. But you will not write the bill based on such a report. Before it is made you will be hurled from the seats of power in this House, and Republicans, true to their party principles, chastened by defeat, tried and tempered by adversity, will again be called to control and responsibility. Then we will write upon the statute books a tariff bill, based on accurate information, whose schedules, while affording no harbor or opportunity for monopoly or oppression, shall protect American labor and industry against unfair and unequal competition from foreign shores. [Loud applause on Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose at this time to discuss the tariff question, but to avail myself of a privilege under the rule to pronounce a brief eulogy on the one-hundredth anniversary of the birth of Stephen A. Douglas, touching his life, his character, and his public services.

Mr. Chairman, Stephen A. Douglas was born 100 years ago to-day in the town of Brandon, in the State of Vermont. His father died when he was 2 months of age, leaving the family with limited means. He received an academic education at Brandon and at Canandaigua, N. Y. He was very studious and unusually bright and promising. At the age of 20, short of stature and slender of figure, he turned his face to the westward in search of fame and fortune. He reached Jacksonville, Ill., in the autumn of 1833, a stranger without money and without friends. He taught school, read law, and took an active interest in politics, and within 14 years after the date of his arrival he had been admitted to the bar, had been a member of the Illinois Legislature, prosecuting attorney, registrar of the land office, secretary of state, judge of the supreme court, and three times elected a Representative in Congress, and had been elected to and entered upon his first term in the United States Senate when not yet 34 years of age. His rise was phenomenal. The history of this country, with all its splendid opportunities and brilliant men, fails to record another instance of such rapid progress and achievement.

He was a born leader of men. His presence inspired confidence, and his marvelous intellect was of that magic power that men intuitively recognized his force of character, dominating influence, and supreme leadership. He was an orator of superb ability, perhaps the superior of any man among the great men then in public life.

Soon after he entered the Senate he became the most potent factor in that body, and thenceforth dominated its policies and shaped its legislation. Nor did his control and leadership confine itself to the upper branch of Congress. Although he died at the early age of 48, no man in this country has acquired a greater influence than that exercised by Douglas over the minds of the people. No man has had a greater personal following. For a decade the great majority of the people had absolute confidence in his political integrity and implicitly trusted and followed him and supported every measure of public importance advocated by him.

The last 10 years of his life were the most stormy years in the political history of the country, and Douglas was the one central figure. By far the most potent factor in politics, he occupied a middle ground between the contentions of the North and those of the South, and sought in every way within the province of man to effect a reconciliation and bring about a condition of affairs which would avoid a conflict of arms between the two sections of the country. But so intense and bitter had the conflict become that longer delay or further compromise was impossible, and Douglas went down to defeat between the extreme contentions—the upper and nether millstones—of the two opposing factions.

Although he had been defeated by Mr. Lincoln for the Presidency, when war came Douglas arose to sublime heights, and espoused the cause of the Union with a vigor and force unexcelled, and contributed by the might and power of his influence more to the support of the administration and the cause of the Union than any other individual or group of men throughout the entire North. So complete was his control over the members of his own party that when he spoke all political differences were forgotten, and his followers rallied to the support of Lincoln and to the cause of the Union as one man.

When the excitement and intensity which attended the outbreak of hostilities was at its height in the State of Illinois and the Middle West, Douglas addressed a joint session of the Illinois Legislature, upon the invitation of that body, and delivered his last and most famous speech in support of the Union. This speech was made on April 26, 1861. The effect was inspiring; it stilled every opposition, and lined up all factions in the North in support of the Constitution and the flag. If eloquence is measured by the immediate and momentous effect on the minds of men, then this speech deserves to rank among the great orations of the world, and is well worth reproduction here, and I ask the privilege of incorporating a portion of it in the RECORD as a part of these remarks. He was introduced by Hon. Shelby M. Cullom, then speaker of the Illinois House of Representatives, and said:

For the first time since the adoption of the Federal Constitution a widespread conspiracy exists to destroy the best Government the sun of heaven ever shed its rays upon. Hostile armies are now marching upon the Federal Capital with the view of planting a revolutionary flag upon its dome, seizing the national archives, and taking captive the President. A war of aggressive extermination is being waged against the Government established by our fathers.

Already the piratical flag has been unfurled against the commerce of the United States. Letters of marque have been issued appealing to the pirates of the world to assemble under that revolutionary flag and commit depredation upon the commerce carried on under the Stars and Stripes. The navigation of our great river into the Gulf of Mexico is obstructed. Customhouses have already been established and hostile batteries have been planted upon its banks.

The question is whether this war of aggression shall proceed and we remain with folded arms, or whether we shall meet the aggressors at the threshold and turn back the tide of revolution and usurpation.

So long as there was hope of a peaceful solution I prayed and implored for compromise. I can appeal to my countrymen with confidence that I have spared no effort, omitted no opportunity to secure a peaceful solution of all these troubles and restore peace, happiness, and fraternity to this country.

When all propositions of peace fail and a war of aggression is proclaimed there is but one course left for the patriot, and that is to rally under the flag which has waved over the Capital since the days of Washington and around the Government established by him and his compeers. The first duty of an American citizen, or of a citizen of any constitutional government, is obedience to the constitution and the laws of his country.

It is a crime against the inalienable and indefeasible right of every American citizen to attempt to destroy the Government under which we were born. It is a crime against constitutional freedom and the hopes of the friends of freedom throughout the wide world to attempt to blot out the United States from the map of Christendom.

Yet this attempt is now being made. The Government of our fathers is to be overthrown and destroyed. The Capital that bears the name of the Father of his Country is to be bombarded and leveled to the earth among the rubbish and the dust of things that are past. The records of your Government are to be scattered to the four winds of heaven. The constituted authorities placed there by the same high authority that placed Washington and Jefferson and Jackson in the chair are to be captured and spirited away, to become a byword and a scorn to the nations of the world.

Not only is our constitutional government to be stricken down, not only is our flag to be blotted out, but the very foundations of social order are to be undermined and destroyed. The demon of destruction is to be let loose over the face of the land; a reign of terror and mob law is to prevail in each section of the Union, and the man who dares to speak for the cause of justice and moderation in either section is to be marked down as a traitor.

I appeal to you, my countrymen, not to allow your passions to get the better of your judgment. Do not allow your vengeance on the authors of this great iniquity to lead you into rash and cruel and desperate acts upon loyal citizens who may differ with you in opinion. Let the spirit of moderation and justice prevail. You can not expect within so brief a period after an exciting political canvass that every man can rise to the high and patriotic level of forgetting his party prejudices and sacrifice everything upon the altar of his country, but allow me to say to you, you will not be true to your country if you ever attempt to manufacture partisan capital out of the misfortunes of your country. When calling upon Democrats to rally to the tented field, leaving wife, child, father, and mother behind them, to rush to the rescue of your Government, do not make war upon them and try to manufacture partisan capital at their expense out of the struggle in which they are engaged from the holiest and purest of motives. Then I appeal to you, my own Democratic friends—those men who have never failed to rally under the glorious banner of the country whenever an enemy, at home or abroad, has dared to assail it—to you with whom it has always been my pride to act—do not allow defeat in a partisan struggle and the elevation of an opposing party to power, do not let that convert you from patriots into traitors to your native land.

Whenever our Government is assailed, when hostile armies are marching under new and odious banners against the Government of our country, the shortest way to peace is the most stupendous preparation for war. Every friend of freedom, every champion and advocate of constitutional liberty, throughout the land must feel that this cause is his own.

What is the attempt now being made? Several States of the Union have chosen to declare that they will no longer obey the Constitution; that they will withdraw from the Government established by our fathers; that they will dissolve without our consent the bonds that have united us together. But not content with that, they proceed to invade and obstruct our dearest and most inalienable rights secured by the Constitution.

I have struggled, almost against hope, to avert the calamities of war and to effect a reunion and reconciliation with our brethren of the South. I yet hope it may be done, but I am not able to point out to you how it may be effected. Nothing short of Providence can reveal to us the issue of this great struggle. Bloody, calamitous, I fear it will be. Let us so conduct it, if a collision must come, that we may stand justified in the eyes of Him who knows our hearts and who will judge our every act. We must not yield to resentment nor to the spirit of vengeance, much less to the desire for conquest or ambition. I see no path of ambition open in a bloody struggle for triumph over my own countrymen. There is no path for ambition open in a divided country. Hence whatever we may do must be the result of conviction, of patriotic duty—the duty we owe to ourselves, to our posterity, and to the friends of constitutional liberty and self-government throughout the world.

My friends, I can say no more. To discuss these topics is the most painful duty of my life. It is with a sad heart, with a grief that I have never before experienced, that I have to contemplate this fearful struggle; but I believe in my conscience that it is a duty we owe ourselves, our children, and our God to protect this Government and the flag of our country.

His death, which followed soon after this speech was delivered, was a great loss to the country. The Nation could ill afford to spare a man of his great worth in the hour of its peril, but he had spoken, and the magic of his name and the power of his word were as potent in death as in life, and while the country lost the wisdom of his counsel, the influence of his last words became an invaluable asset to the administration and to the cause of the Union.

It is said of Douglas that he was ambitious, and that his whole life was lived with one object in view—to achieve the Presidency. Inordinate ambition may be a crime, but the ambition of Douglas was laudable, and with all his craving for that high office, he was, above all, a patriot. Ambition may also be imputed to other great men who have aspired to the Presidency but failed of their goal. It is a notable fact that the great men of the country who have aspired to and sought the Presidency with a consuming desire and ambition, to the exclusion of all other aspirations, have failed to achieve the aim and object of their lives. The way to the Presidency is strewn with disappointed hopes and shattered ambitions. Good men and great have achieved the supreme and ultimate aim, but those who have sought it most, whose lives were spent seeking that exalted station, have signally failed. Notable among these are Henry Clay, Daniel Webster, Stephen A. Douglas, and James G. Blaine. Let us hope that the rule will not apply to men now in life, but that those who have lost a while, but are yet full of hope and prospects, may prove the exception and achieve the object of their most cherished ambition and that the millions who are to-day hoping and praying for their success may realize their fondest hopes.

The name of Douglas is inseparably linked with that of the immortal Lincoln. It is not my aim nor would it serve any good purpose here to analyze their characters and to compare or contrast these two great men. They were opposites in manner, in speech, and in form, but in the essentials that go to make great men there was no such dissimilarity as is generally supposed; both loved their fellow man, both were men of the highest type, the strictest integrity, the best motives, and the loftiest ideals; both were politicians after the school of their day and both were statesmen of highest rank; both were ambitious, both aspired to the highest station in life, and both attained greatness and distinction; both were patriots and both laid down their ambitions and gave up their lives upon the altar of their common country. [Applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. HELGESEN].

Mr. HELGESEN. Mr. Chairman, when a great political party has been intrusted with power and has been given such an overwhelming majority as the Democratic Party now has in this House, and when that party has adopted the policy of legislating through the secret caucus, simply bringing the results of their caucus actions into the House for ratification, I presume it is a waste of time and energy for a Member on this side of the House to make any observations on the character of the contemplated legislation or to offer any argument against the wisdom of any of the provisions of the measures thus to be disposed of. But as I have never been able to agree with the numerous tariff policies advocated by the Democratic Party in the last 50 years, and as I have the honor of representing the greatest agricultural district in the United States, I can not sit quietly by and see the agricultural industry, the greatest and most important in this country, the industry upon which every other industry, and, in fact, the whole country, depends for its prosperity, ruthlessly discriminated against as it is in this bill without entering a vigorous protest.

So important is the agricultural industry that no nation has ever attained its greatest possible advance that has not carefully protected it, and no nation that has failed to jealously guard the interests of its farmers has long maintained its once proud position among the nations of the world. I know that free traders are want to point to England as an exception to this rule, but it is not so certain that England will long escape the fate of every other nation that has neglected the interests of agriculture, although, because of the very limited area of fertile land in the "Island Empire," she is less affected by the steady decline in her agriculture than would be any of the other great nations of the world, and but for this fact she could not have survived her present policy as long as she has. But this is a burning question in England to-day, and an Englishman, discussing the question of duties on agricultural products last March, said:

> What agricultural results have accrued under our present fiscal system? (1) We have enormously decreased the annual production of wealth from our fertile land; (2) cast away steady employment for more than a million men; (3) driven these to emigrate or migrate to our centers, already crowded, in search (and often in vain) of precarious casual employment at poor wages; (4) diminished by one-half our race of skilled food producers; (5) secured dearer, not cheaper, food; (6) made it so that there are few, if any, articles of food imported which we could not ourselves now profitably produce at the present prices or at lower. * * *
> Duties on manufactures will be all right for that limb of the body politic, but what about the other sick one—the important one of agriculture? What the State needs is a balanced production from land and workshop. The restoration of agriculture to its pristine prosperity, to its old position as an absorber of labor, is essential, and this can best be done by duties on imported farm products. * * *
> The main object of every real fiscal reform must be to increase home production, home employment, home wages.

Mr. Keir Hardie, the well-known English Socialist, a supporter in the British Parliament of the present "free-trade" ministry, writing in the Clarion of January 9, has this to say about the conditions observed in the United States under protection:

> Life out there, especially in the West, has more freedom than at home, and the very fact of wages being high leads to a greater self-respect and a higher all-around standard of living. Men walk with more independence in their gait than they do with us, and there are opportunities, generally speaking, for getting on there which do not exist here.

Under the exhaustive investigations of her tariff commission England herself is gradually awakening to the conditions that her neglected agriculture has brought upon her. The report of her tariff commission says that there is—> a broad contrast between the policy adopted by foreign countries and that adopted by the United Kingdom. Generally speaking, all foreign and European countries accept as the basis of their economic policy the necessity for maintaining a flourishing agriculture. This is partly due to economic reasons, partly to considerations of national defense and security. The result, speaking generally, is that these countries, instead of pursuing an exclusively manufacturing or an exclusively agrarian policy, have endeavored to maintain a balance between agriculture and manufactures.

"A balance between agriculture and manufactures!" That is the key to prosperity and happiness in any country, and especially in this country, where we possess untold millions of acres of fertile land, coupled with a salubrious climate, that makes it possible to produce at home everything that our people need for food. But this key to the prosperity and happiness of our people has either escaped the notice of the Democratic Party or for selfish political reasons they have deliberately thrown it aside.

I again quote from the 1906 report of the English tariff commission, which says:

> The causes of the decline in agriculture are world-wide in their operation, affecting all importing countries. The striking feature in the case of the United Kingdom is that agriculture has been more depressed than in any other country, and more depressed than any other branch of economic activity. During the last 25 years the course of all agricultural prices has been the same downward direction, with the result that agriculture has been subject to a great combination of causes, all tending toward its depression.
> European countries generally have pursued a policy involving import duties on agricultural produce, whereas in the United Kingdom agriculturists have been subject to the unrestricted importation of foreign produce on terms not dissimilar in many cases from those experienced by manufacturers who complain of dumping.

"Dumping" is the marketing of the surplus products of an industry in a foreign country cheaper than it is sold in the country where it is produced, and any country that permits this kind of competition is not properly caring for its industries.

That legislation has a great deal to do with the success or failure of any industry is evidenced by the difference in the prosperity of the agricultural industries of England and those of Germany and France, where they have ample protection. James J. Hill, in his book, "Highways of Progress," says:

> How to meet German competition is to-day the study of every intelligent leader of industry and every cabinet on the Continent of Europe. It will be found that a large share of her world-wide success is due to symmetrical national development. Agricultural industry has not been slighted. Behold a contrast that throws light upon the idle host of England's unemployed marching despondently through streets whose shop windows are crowded with wares of German make. Between 1875 and 1900 in Great Britain 2,691,428 acres which were under cereals and 755,255 acres which were under green crops went out of cultivation. In Germany during the same period the cultivated area grew from 22,840,950 to 23,971,573 hectares, an increase of 5 per cent.

Is there any better illustration of the blighting influence of free trade in agricultural products than is furnished by this statement? England, so densely populated that if every acre were made to produce its utmost enough could not be produced to feed all the people, her farmers with the best market for food products in all Europe right at their doors and enjoying cheap farm labor, has under free trade been compelled to abandon millions of acres of fertile land, and is abandoning more every year, while in Germany, under protection, every acre of cultivated land has not only been retained, but every arable acre is being gradually redeemed to add to the cultivated area of the country. Count Bismarck, in the Reichstag in May, 1879, made the following statement:

> Is not the moment approaching when our agriculture will no longer be able to exist, because corn is pressed down to a price at which it can not be remuneratively produced in Germany, taxation, the cost of living, and the cost of land being as they are? When that moment comes, then not only agriculture, but the Prussian State and the German Empire will go to ruin as well.

And immediately thereafter he established a system of tariff duties on German agricultural products. To Bismarck, therefore, who in early life was a rank free trader, but who, unlike most free traders, permitted stubborn practical facts to convince him of his error, the German farmers owe the fact that they are among the most prosperous farmers in the world.

If there is any country in Europe where the farmers are more prosperous than in Germany, it is France. But the French farmers met with the same trouble that is sure to overtake the farmers in every country sooner or later, and but for the wisdom of her statesmen they would be no better off to-day than the farmers in England. Mr. Merideth, an English authority, says:

The trouble in France, as elsewhere, centered in the persistent fall in the prices of agricultural produce, due in part to the general appreciation of gold, but due principally to the cheapening of transport and the appearance on the home market of transoceanic cereals and meat. The result was the increased protection of agricultural products in 1885 and 1887 and the tariff of 1892.

Having thus received ample protection they became, and I believe are still considered, the most prosperous farmers in Europe, if not in the world.

Again, quoting from Mr. Hill's Highways of Progress. He says:

Agriculture in England has suffered in the last 25 years by the opening of new land in America and the cheapening of the world's transportation—and he should have added "and because the Government did not protect the farmers against those conditions."

We need not go to England to find an illustration of the effect that the opening of new land and the cheapening of transportation will have on agriculture where the farmers are not protected against those influences. We have but to go back in our own history some 40 to 50 years to the time when our great western empire, an empire of the richest agricultural lands in the world, began to be opened, just at a time when transportation was being revolutionized so as to almost annihilate distance and so cheapened that the products of the Far West could successfully be marketed in the older and more populous sections of the East. In those days New England farms were selling at from $100 to $200 per acre, but the opening of the great West with its cheap land and the wonderful yields of its rich virgin soil, coupled with cheap transportation, gradually reduced the value of New England farms until many of them were actually sold for less than the cost of the improvements. But because of the low price of farm products that often prevailed in the West, the farmers were unable to farm as scientifically as they should have done, and therefore tried to make up for unscientific methods by farming larger areas, which resulted in lower yields.

The result has been that with reduced yields and increased cost of land, labor, machinery, and everything the Western farmer has to buy he can no longer produce foodstuffs at as low cost as when his land was new and more productive. Because of this New England is again coming into her own, and her farms are gradually regaining much of their lost value. Farmers in New England or anywhere else can by patience, perseverance, industry, and intelligence overcome and outlive any natural handicap, but there is one menace that always threatens their industry, namely, the fallacious political doctrine that it is "immoral" and "unconstitutional" for a government to consider and care for the welfare of its own people and its own industries as against the rest of the world. We have tried to put this doctrine into practice time and time again, always with disastrous results, but it seems that each succeeding generation refuses to learn or benefit by the experience of those who have gone before, and so the Democratic Party, the exponent of this doctrine, is again in power. The Democratic Party, like the farmers who vote that ticket once in each generation, apparently refuses to learn or benefit by the experience of other nations, and therefore they propose in this tariff bill to put our farmers in direct competition with Canada, Argentine, and other new and rapidly developing sections of the world. Do not forget that when you force our farmers to compete with these countries they will have to compete, not only with their rich virgin soil and cheap railroad transportation, as did New England against our great West, but against the cheap South American labor and ocean freights, which when the Panama Canal is finished will be a greater handicap than most men now realize.

They tell us that it has become necessary to put food products on the free list because our farmers can no longer produce enough food to supply the needs of the American people and because the farmers are getting so much for their products that the people in the cities are justly complaining of the high cost of living. I make the assertion here and now, without fear of successful contradiction, that both of these statements are erroneous and without any foundation whatever. But let us examine them. Mr. James J. Hill has spent fortunes in agricultural experiments and has made a lifelong study of our agricultural conditions, and is therefore acknowledged to be the greatest authority we have on our agricultural possibilities.

In his book Highways of Progress he makes the following significant statement on this subject.

Only one-half the land in private ownership is now tilled. That tillage does not produce one-half what the land might be made to yield without losing an atom of its fertility.

In profit we are satisfied with a small yield at the expense of the most rapid soil deterioration. We are satisfied with a national annual average product of $11.38 per acre at the cost of a diminished annual return from the same fields when we might as well secure two or three times that sum.

An industrious, fairly intelligent, and exceedingly comfortable agricultural community can raise from the soil food enough for the needs of 490 persons to the square mile. Adopting that ratio, the 414,498,467 acres of improved farm lands in the United States on the date of the last official report—an area materially enlarged by the present time—would support in comfort 317,350,405 people, enabling them at the same time to raise considerable food for export and to engage in necessary manufacturing employments. Applying the same ratio to the entire acreage of farm lands within the United States, both improved and unimproved, which was at the same date 838,591,774, the population indicated as able to live with comfort and prosperity on the actually existing agricultural area of this country, under an intelligent system and a fairly competent but by no means highly scientific method of agriculture, rises to 642,046,823.

If this statement, that our farmers can and eventually will support a population of about 650,000,000 people, is correct—and no intelligent man who has given the subject careful and serious study will deny that it is at least approximately correct—and if it is, then the statement that our farmers can not now abundantly support our present population becomes so absurd that it would seem as if it could only be made by driveling idiots or by men who would rather venture a guess on any subject than to give it careful and serious study.

Next to Mr. Hill, our greatest expert on agricultural products and possibilities, is another big railroad man, Mr. B. F. Yoakum. In an address before the Farm Credits Conference in Chicago, on April 9, on "Relations of the Government, agriculture, and the railroads and their bearing on better marketing," he said:

Agriculture and transportation have laid the foundation which has made this the greatest and most powerful Nation of the world. They are the biggest factors in America's growth.

There are now not more than 1,000 miles of new railroad under construction. It would require the construction of 165,000 miles of additional railroad to furnish the same transportation facilities west of the Mississippi River that there are east of it, on the basis of area. That great area of rich country can not grow as it should on 1,000 miles per annum of newly built railroads.

Mr. Yoakum said that he believed in the readjustment of the tariff, but declared that if Congress should wipe out the entire tariff on every article that is brought into this country on last year's collections it would only amount to $326,000,000, while the waste which falls upon the farmers of the Nation means an annual loss of over five times the entire amount collected by our revenue collectors. In other words, the annual waste on our farms, caused by insufficient transportation facilities, excessive rates on cheap products and by our present absurd system of distribution, is greater than the amount paid by all our people yearly for potatoes, flour, boots and shoes, and woolen goods of all kinds. If the farmers and the consumers of their products could divide this loss between them, it would go a long way toward solving the high cost of living for both, but to make this possible would require the highest kind of statesmanship plus patient and persevering efforts, while to take the products of any great industry and thow them into the free list requires neither brains nor ability.

Now, let us examine the other contention, namely, that the farmer and the price he gets for his products is responsible for the "high cost of living." It matters little where we begin, so let us take potatoes first. You have put potatoes on the free list. Why? You say because the poor people have to pay from $1 to $1.50 per bushel for this necessity, and that is more than they can afford. I grant you that this is true, but do you know that there are enormous quantities of potatoes rotting in the fields almost every year because they are so cheap that they will not pay the cost of getting them to the consumer? Do you know that the farmers of North Dakota alone would be delighted to contract with the Government or any other responsible party to supply all the potatoes that can be consumed by the whole United States at 25 cents per bushel on the farm? And the finest potatoes in the world at that. Now, is not that cheap enough? I admit that the consumer has to pay from 400 to 600 per cent more for potatoes than the farmer gets for them, but why should you punish the farmer for that? He is not to blame. And if you are so ignorant that you can not determine the cause of the enormous and unjustifiable increase in the price of farm products between the farmer and the consumer, or if you are so incompetent that you can not remedy the wrong, you ought at least to have manhood and decency enough not to try, convict, and sentence our farmers without a hearing and without investigation just to furnish political capital for some of the Democratic statesmen who came from the cities and congested centers of our country and whose constituents, if this bill becomes a law, will soon become co-sufferers with the farmers.

I have just visited the markets of this city for the purpose of finding out what the consumer has to pay for farm products and how much prices are increased over what the farmers receive. I will here insert a table in the RECORD giving the facts and figures in detail:

Table A.

Commodity.	Unit of sale to consumer.	Price the farmer receives.	Price the consumer pays.	Per cent of increase consumer pays over the farmer's price.	Per cent of purchase price chargeable to distribution.	Per cent of the purchase price received by the farmer.
Wheat flour	Barrel	$3.38	$8.00	140	57	43
Do	Bread, 325 loaves to the barrel.	3.38	16.25	380	79	21
Rye flour	Barrel	1.94	9.80	400	80	20
Corn meal	10-pound sack	.12½	.50	300	75	25
Corn flakes	1-pound package	.01¼	.15	1,100	91	9
Oatmeal	do	.01	.10	900	90	10
Potatoes	Bushel	.25	1.00	300	75	25
Onions	do	.50	2.00	300	75	25
Turnips	do	.25	1.60	540	84	16
Parsnips	do	.35	2.00	470	82	18

But as I go along I want to tell you what the per cent of increase in prices is: Onions 300 per cent, parsnips 470 per cent, rutabagas and turnips 540 per cent, milk and cream more than 50 per cent, butter from 25 to 40 per cent, eggs from 25 to 50 per cent, oatmeal 900 per cent, cornmeal 300 per cent, corn flakes 1,100 per cent, and all package breakfast foods about the same; all kinds of canned goods show an increase of several hundred per cent; rye flour 400 per cent, wheat flour 140 per cent, and bread 380 per cent. I asked the marketmen if these prices were unusual, and they said they were not. I asked what their retail prices were last year and the year before, and they said they were about the same. I then asked how they accounted for the fact that wheat, rye, and corn are from 30 per cent to 40 per cent cheaper this year than last, and yet the consumer has received no benefit from the decline. The reply was that while flour, cornmeal, and so forth, can be bought in carload lots somewhat cheaper than last year, the decline is not enough to permit any change in the selling price of the small packages in which it has to be delivered to the city trade; and as to package goods, nearly all of them were sold under a trade-mark and were put on the market at a uniform price, and the increase or the decrease in the price of the farm products out of which they are made simply resulted in an increase or decrease of the profits of the concern that puts them on the market.

As an illustration that the price the farmer is getting for his products is not responsible for the high cost of living, let me quote from a statement made to a reporter of the Chicago Tribune by Mr. J. R. Cahill, an investigator for the Board of Trade of England, while in this country for the purpose of investigating the price of food, and so forth. He said:

> I can not understand how we can buy bread in England for one-third the price you pay in Chicago when you send us our wheat. You pay 5 cents for 14 ounces of bread, while we get a loaf weighing 64 ounces for 10 cents, made out of your own wheat. Our 4-pound loaf never costs more than 12 cents, and usually only 10 cents.

While it needs no argument to prove that it is an injustice to make the American consumer pay more than twice as much for his bread as the English consumer pays, it is clear that the price which the farmer gets for his wheat has nothing to do with the price of bread, for in each case his wheat is sold for the same price.

The following table, compiled from the records of the Agriculture Department, shows that the price of farm products has declined the last year to such an extent as to seriously cripple the industry, and still that great decline has not been reflected in the slightest degree in the city retail "markets":

Table B.

Commodity.	Average price paid farmer, Apr. 1, 1912.	Average price paid farmer, Apr. 1, 1913.	Percentage of reduction in farm products.
Wheat (hard)	$0.92	$0.72	21
Corn	.71	.53	25
Barley	.92	.48	47
Oats	.52	.33	36
Flax	1.91	1.13	40
Potatoes	1.17	.50	57

If a decline in prices, as great as this table shows, has not benefited the consumer in the slightest degree, what reason have you for thinking that forcing down the price of wheat and rye another 10 cents per bushel is going to benefit the consumer when a decline of more than twice that much has not reached him? Forcing down the price of wheat 10 cents per bushel, which would reduce the cost of a loaf of bread one-seventh of a cent, will not help the consumer, but may mark the difference between success and failure with the wheat raisers. Any intelligent and unprejudiced student can quickly convince himself that the farmer is not now getting more for his products than enough to pay for expenses, upkeep, and a comfortable living, and that if the price of his products could be reduced to the lowest point at which his industry could exist at all the reduction would be so small that it would not be passed on to the ultimate consumer. There is less added to the price of wheat between the producer and consumer than on most other products, and still a reduction of 10 cents per bushel on wheat would make possible a reduction of only one-seventh of a cent per loaf of bread, an amount so small that the baker would add it to his profit instead of reducing the price of the loaf. It would be just as sensible for the farmers to say that because their business is not now profitable the consumer should be made to pay more for farm products, even if the increase in price did not go to the farmer, as it is for the consumers to say that because they have to pay too much for farm products the farmer shall be compelled to reduce his price even if the reduction is not passed on to the consumer.

It is very evident therefore that by discriminating against the farmers who raise breadstuffs you are not even going to help the poor people of the cities to cheaper bread, and if you succeed in making the raising of foodstuffs less profitable than it is now you will bankrupt that industry, which means that no other industry can succeed that depends on the farmers for a market, and that includes practically all our industries.

Why have you treated barley and malt, the product of barley, different from wheat, rye, buckwheat, and so forth? Of course you are just as inconsistent in dealing with barley as with the other grains mentioned. Your excuse for putting all kinds of flour on the free list, and thereby robbing the farmer of the duty you put on his grain, is said to be that you thought that it might make cheaper bread for the poor. But in dealing with barley you forgot all about the poor, both the poor farmer and the poor beer drinker, for while you have reduced the duty on barley 50 per cent and the duty on malt about 45 per cent you have left the same high duty on beer, ale, stout, and porter contained in the Payne-Aldrich law, which can only be in the interests of the breweries and saloon keepers, for, of course, the ultimate consumer will pay just the same price as before.

The farmers in my State got about 90 cents per bushel for their 1911 barley crop, while they have sold their 1912 crop for about 35 cents a bushel, and still beer, ale, and so forth, by the glass, was the same price both years. Cutting the duty on barley in two will take that amount out of the pockets of the farmers, and no one will be benefited except the breweries and saloon keepers, who may be able to buy a little cheaper at wholesale. I can not understand why you should prefer to favor the breweries and saloon keepers rather than the farmers, unless you figure that you have received more support from them in the past than from the farmers, and that having discriminated against the farmers, as you have in this bill, you will be more dependent on the saloon element in the future than you have been in the past. I know you will say that you have not discriminated against the farmers, citing the fact that you have left a duty of 10 cents per bushel on wheat and oats and 15 cents per bushel on barley, and 10 per cent ad valorem on horses, cattle, sheep, and other farm animals, and that this is as large a duty proportionately as you have allowed on the products of our shops, mills, and factories. This proves one of three things: Either that you are absolutely dishonest in your dealings with the farmer or that you are so densely ignorant that you are unfit to legislate for this great Nation, or that you believe the farmers of this country are so ignorant that they will not recognize the act which has paralyzed their industry or that they will not understand who is responsible for their condition. I can speak for the intelligence of the farmers of the great wheat-growing region of this country, and I want to say to you that there is no more intelligent class of people anywhere in the world than they, but still they can be fooled once in a while. For example, last fall thousands of men in my State voted for a Democratic candidate for the Presidency for the first time in their lives, and they did this for two reasons—first, because they were dissatisfied with the Payne-Aldrich tariff law and the system of legislation under which it was enacted, which, by the way, you have continued; and, second, because the Democratic Party and its candidate for President, Mr. Wilson, had pledged themselves to so revise the tariff laws that no "legitimate industry" should be injured. Believing, as they had a right to believe, that in all the world there is a no more "legitimate industry" than that of agriculture, and having still some faith in the honor of men, they took the Democratic Party and its candidate at their word. Intelligent as they are they could not believe it possible that a great political party could be so corrupt and so absolutely devoid of honor and principle that it would make promises for the sole purpose of getting votes and with no intention whatever of fulfilling them; and neither could they understand how a great political party, after all the experiences of the past, could still be so absolutely ignorant of the first principles of practical economic and industrial laws that it would blindly do the very opposite of what it had promised and honestly believe it was fulfilling its pledges.

Now, let me try to show you in as few words as possible what you are trying to do to the farmers of this country and how you are keeping your platform pledges and the personal pledges of the man who is now the President of the United States.

Let us first take wheat, on which you have left a duty of 10 cents per bushel, but the products of which you have practically put on the free list. What will be the result? It takes 4½ bushels of good wheat to make a barrel of flour. If the American farmer is going to get the benefit of the 10-cents-per-bushel tariff on wheat, a barrel of flour is going to cost the American miller 45 cents more than it costs the Canadian miller. That handicap, with flour on the free list, would put the American miller out of business. If he runs his mills he will have to buy his wheat as cheaply as his Canadian competitor. If this bill becomes law, he will either have to close his mills or force the price of American wheat down to the level of the Canadian market. Now, which of these courses do you think he will pursue? If you do not know, ask any 10-year-old schoolboy, and he will tell you that our millers will be compelled to put our wheat down to the level of the prices paid by their foreign competitors if he is going to continue in business, and therefore the 10-cent duty on wheat will do the farmer no good.

What is true of wheat is equally true of meats of all kinds and oats, to the extent that oats are used for food. It is a self-evident fact that the price of any so-called raw material produced in this country and consumed by our industries will never go higher than the same can be purchased for abroad plus transportation if the finished product is on the free list. Therefore when you put a duty on wheat, cattle, hogs, and sheep, and at the same time put flour, beef, pork, mutton, and wool on the free list, you are perpetrating what would be a huge joke if the consequences would not be so serious. Now, if you honestly believe that the farmer who gets about 20 per cent of the price paid by the consumer for the bread and other products made out of his wheat is the real cause of the high cost of these necessaries, why do not you have the courage of your convictions and put wheat and all other farm products on the free list? The result would be the same and you would not be breaking your solemn promise to the farmers any worse than you will if this bill becomes a law, and you would at least be playing the game open and above board and not trying to stack the cards like a dishonest and contemptible gambler. The farmers thoroughly understand what is about to happen to them, and you can rest assured that they will hold you responsible. But the trouble will be that it will be like going out in the morning and finding your chicken coop empty and then trying to hold an irresponsible thief accountable for the loss. You may be able to place him in the custody of the sheriff for a while, but that will not bring the chickens back, and he will be sure to repeat the operation if he ever gets the chance.

I was very much interested in some of the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee, and I will quote some of the things said there, because those of you who are not particularly interested in the agricultural schedule may not have read them.

Mr. S. H. Cowan, of Texas, representing the cattle interests of that State, was one of the ablest and most interesting witnesses, and a fair sample of all the Democrats who appeared before the committee. He started out by saying:

I am a Democrat, Mr. Chairman; I believe in a tariff for revenue.

Then, continuing, he said:

We are opposed to, and I come here for the purpose of opposing, the placing of cattle and meat products on the free list, and it is upon that subject that I wish to address the committee. * * * We are not advocating a protective tariff. * * * When we come to make laws—and of course we are all attempting here and there to work for the best interests as we see the situation, looking, of course, at the situation with respect to our own districts, trying to satisfy the people, trying to get the most votes for ourselves and our parties, yet when we come down to the business side of it that is the side that we come from here. The man who presents his case like the fish man did this morning, like the lemon man presents it, like the rice man will present it, and like the onion man will present it, and, of course, I might enumerate a thousand others, be he Democrat or Republican, that is the way he will look at the question when he is seeking to retain a tariff—from the standpoint of benefit to his business—and there is no use to deny that. When a Congressman comes to enact a law which will have the effect of benefiting or injuring a business he would be false to his duty if he did not consider the effect of what he does. So I think I state a mere matter of ordinary logic when I say that he does not consider the effect of a tariff system of laws—and I speak of a tariff system and not of a particular article—who does not consider the effect of the system he adopts and then go down from a system to individual items, fails to perform his duty as a Representative of the people and as a patriot of the country.

* * * * * * *

Mr. JAMES. Are the farmers of Texas in favor of untaxed farming implements?

Mr. COWAN. Undoubtedly; just as I am in favor of untaxed shoes and hats and coats and pocketknives and everything, if you come down to the individual disposition. * * * In political meetings, when we make speeches and talk about this great proposition of free trade, in order to save the people from the high cost of living, of course that is one thing; but when we come down to consider what is going to be the effect of a law on the statute books, it is another thing. * * *

Mr. JAMES. Do you think free meat would ruin the cattle industry?

Mr. COWAN. It would.

Mr. JAMES. Did not all the Members of Congress from Texas vote for free meat?

Mr. COWAN. I think they all did.

Mr. JAMES. And were they not elected overwhelmingly?

Mr. COWAN. They were; and we vote the Democratic ticket there in spite of politics, in spite of platforms, in spite of everything that is said in any platform. If the Democratic platform says prohibition, we vote for it; if it says "anti," we vote for it.

Mr. JAMES. I know that is true——

Mr. COWAN. You know that, Mr. JAMES, just like I do. * * *

Mr. FORDNEY. You voted in Texas the Democratic ticket and put in the House of Representatives a heavy Democratic delegation, and immediately after election packed your satchels, came up here, and prayed to them for God's sake not to do the very same things they agreed to do if you elected them. [Laughter.]

Mr. COWAN. There is no use to take time about this, because we both understand it perfectly well.

After this Mr. Cowan went on and made one of the ablest arguments for a protective tariff that has ever been made anywhere; but what I can not understand is how a man so able and intelligent as Mr. Cowan can have the audacity to ask for protection for his own industry and then demand free trade on "shoes and hats and coats and pocketknives and everything" else; but that seems to be the fundamental difference between a Republican and a Democrat. A Republican believes that he has no right to so legislate as to increase the profits of a few industries at the expense of all others. He understands that no tariff system will work out in practice that does not treat all industries alike. The farmer can not sell his products at a profitable price unless he is willing to pay a price for the products that he wants in exchange for his own that will permit of reasonable wages and profit in their making; and if this bill becomes a law our factories, shops, and mills will soon discover that they can not maintain a profitable business after the farmer, who is the biggest consumer of their products, has been robbed of his profits.

This is, nevertheless, in accordance with Democratic doctrine, for Democrats all seem obsessed with the idea that by some legislative legerdemain it can be made possible for everyone to sell their own labor and products at a high price and buy every other person's labor and products at a cheap price. This doctrine, like perpetual motion, has been declared possible as far back as we have any records, but neither has ever been put into successful operation, and it is safe to say never will.

But let us go back to Mr. Cowan's testimony and brief before the committee. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] accused Mr. Cowan of taking a narrow view of the subject, saying:

You are not considering the welfare of the people of the United States?

Mr. COWAN. If you will allow me to proceed, I will show you that I am.

Mr. HARRISON. I shall be very glad if you can do so.

Mr. COWAN. I am representing the best interests of the people of the United States. I undertake to say that when you discourage cattle raising in this country—mind you, Texas and the Mexican border and Montana and Idaho and Nebraska and Kansas are not the only cattle-growing countries; there are over a million head of cattle in the State of New York, cattle shipped from Texas, which are finished in New York and sold on the Buffalo market. Calves that are bought in Texas are fed on the farms of Indiana and Ohio. The interwoven fabric of farming, where you raise corn, grain of all sorts, and hay with the live stock in the cattle-producing business of this country, is such that you can not separate the two, that you can not continue the fertility of the soil of this country without the use of live stock. In the States of Kentucky and Tennessee—I having been born in Tennessee—I know that the red hills in Tennessee and large parts of Kentucky are rejuvenated because they sow it in clover and grass and graze cattle on it; and so they do in Virginia, and so they do in Pennsylvania and so they do all over the entire farming country.

Now, I say it is to the best interests of the country that it be self-supporting in the way of the productions of cattle. So that if you, just for the sake of patronizing some people, who say they want cheaper meats, shall open the doors of this country to the flood of meats that could come in here at the end—maybe not right now—from South America, just to the extent that that meat takes the place in New York, in Philadelphia, in Boston, in Baltimore of the cattle which we are shipping from the West out here, just to that extent we fail to get a market.

Who is going to ship it here? Have you ever thought of that? The man who can handle it. Why, I know Members of Congress, men running for office, making public speeches, who have asserted that the object they had in putting meats on the free list was in order to undertake to curb the Packers' Trust. That is a popular thing to do at a logrolling. It is popular to these people who do not know anything about it, and yet the packers of the United States own a majority of the packing houses of Buenos Aires, and there is not a single packing house in Buenos Aires that undertakes to start out a shipload of beef to New York.

Now let me give you some statements made on this subject by Herbert W. Mumford, Chief of Animal Industry, last September, and we will be able to better understand the position the American farmer will be in if this bill becomes a law.

He says:

From the international standpoint the most important and recent development in the meat industry of the Argentine Republic is the entrance and growing ascendency of North American interests.

Chicago meat companies entered this field only seven years ago, but have already attained such a position that they are a decided, if not a dominating, influence in the progress of the trade and the control of prices. The extent of their interests is only partially known to the public, either of Argentina or the United States, but they admittedly hold two of the seven companies engaged in the production and export of cold-storage meat and are believed to have at least a working understanding with several of the others. They have also secured land for the purpose, it is believed, of establishing new plants.

The two avowedly North American enterprises are the La Plata Cold Storage Co. and the La Blanca Co. The former, since coming under its present control, has risen from a state of insignificance to that of the largest single producer in the Argentine field.

Taken together, the La Plata and the La Blanca companies last year produced a third of the Argentina's total output of cold-storage beef and almost as large a proportion of the mutton and lamb. Their rapid expansion is indicated by the fact that jointly they have chartered all the space in 19 new steamships ordered by the Nelson Line for the River Plata fresh-meat trade.

But most important of all, perhaps, as showing the influence of the American companies in the Argentine is the fact that they are generally credited with having stimulated the industry through the introduction of progressive methods, particularly in the development of chilled beef. Chilled beef—the kind to which United States consumers are accustomed and regarded as superior to frozen beef—has been brought into commercial importance within the last year or more by the North American companies, and seems destined to supersede in importance the frozen product. In 1909 the La Plata Cold Storage Co. produced more than twice as much chilled meat as any other company and, together with the La Blanca Co., marketed more than 50 per cent of the entire output of that article.

The importance of the position of the Chicago companies in the Argentine is that, apparently, it puts the meat industry of the two principal producing countries in the same hands. Argentina is the largest exporter of beef in the world and, next to New Zealand, the largest shipper of mutton. Argentina now occupies the place formerly held by the United States as a purveyor of beef to Europe, the increase in the home consumption having cut down our exports in a marked degree.

Shipments of beef from the River Plata to the United States may come shortly, but they will probably be directed by the same interests which supply the market here, not in opposition to them.

It is generally known that in our meat industry the so-called Beef Trust is in absolute control of the machinery of distribution, and that they can put the wholesale price of meats to any price they see fit; but it is not so generally known that our Beef Trust is in practical control of the system of distribution in South America, but when this is understood it is easy to understand what "free meats" will mean to the farmers of this country. Putting meats on the free list is putting a club in the hands of the Beef Trust that they can use against the farmers and ranchers of this country with tremendous effect. It can then say to our farmers, "If you do not want to sell at the price we offer, it is immaterial to us, for we can now get our supplies from the ends of the earth, and as we already have our packing houses, cold-storage plants, and refrigerator ships engaged in the South American trade, we will get our supplies from there for a while." Thus driven to the wall, our farmers will have to take what the Beef Trust is willing to give. If this would result in cheaper meats to the consumer, there would at least be some compensation, but anyone who knows anything about the Beef Trust and its methods knows that this would be highly improbable. In the past the Beef Trust has used to the fullest extent its power to hold the wholesale price of meats at the highest price that would not reduce consumption enough to injure its business, and it will no doubt continue the same policy in the future, and if they do, no benefits will accrue to the consumers through "free meats."

If you really wanted to benefit both the producer and consumer of meats you should have retained a duty on beef and fat cattle and admitted free stockers and feeders under 2 years old. This would have permitted our farmers to have imported hundreds of thousands of young stock to be finished on the grass and cheap feed that often goes to waste because they have nothing to feed it to. This would so help to increase our supply of beef that we would not have to go abroad for it. In my opinion, any man who votes for a law that tends to make our people dependent upon any foreign country for the food that we can produce ourselves in abundance is worse than a traitor. But you will ask, "What is the difference whether we go abroad for our beef or for stockers and feeders?" There is all the difference in the world, my friends. There is very little money for anyone in raising stockers and feeders, and if beef can be imported into this country free the young cattle will be finished in the country where they are raised and shipped to us as beef, while, if you put a duty on beef but let the young stock in free, that young stock will be shipped to this country and our farmers could buy them for a price they could afford to pay and in finishing them on the cheap feed that now is often wasted, they would not only greatly increase the quantity of beef but they would also produce a large quantity of the one thing most needed by our farmers to-day—a source of wealth lost sight of by most men dealing with this question—namely, barnyard manure. Unless we want our farm lands to go to rack and ruin we must stop the steady and constant depletion of soil fertility and return to the soil much of what has already been lost, and the application of barnyard manure is the readiest and most effective method of accomplishing this object, and to protect our soil we must foster and develop the live-stock industry among our farmers.

In a letter written on January 14, 1913, by Hon. J. A. Bonsteel, Government soil-survey scientist, he said:

Our farmers are now putting fertility back into the soil through stable and yard manure to an estimated value of $1,000,000,000 per year.

But still they are taking the fertility out of the soil much faster than they are putting it back, and if this continues we shall soon have destroyed the greatest source of wealth possessed by this or any other countr in the world.

Mr. Bonsteel, in the letter referred to, also said:

There are many communities in the older settled portions of the United States, which have been occupied for farming purposes for a period ranging from 100 to 150 years, where the crop yields at the present time equal or exceed the yields which have been secured at any previous period in the history of the community. In these localities a rational crop rotation has been supplemented by the feeding of live stock and the use of stable and yard manures.

This shows the possibility of maintaining the fertility of our soil and of supporting many times our present population under a correct and scientific system of farming. Unfortunately, however, this system has only been practiced in isolated sections of the country, as is witnessed by the fact that our average yield of grains per acre is gradually decreasing. Our western farmers in the past had a virgin soil to handle, and they seemed to think that its fertility was inexhaustible, and it is only of recent years that they have realized their mistake and have sought to correct their mistake by introducing a system of mixed farming and stock raising. In this proposed law you strike a vicious blow at the live-stock industry—the one industry that has in its keeping the welfare and success of our entire agricultural system.

The men of any party that do not see in the restoration and preservation of our soil fertility one of the greatest problems confronting this country are not statesmen, to say the least, and whether they ignore this great problem through ignorance or an insane political ambition makes no difference, for the result will be the same.

When we come to discuss the "high cost of living," any intelligent man can easily satisfy himself that the prices received by the farmer is not the cause of it, and surely the cause should be known before a remedy can be found and intelligently and effectively applied. A good example to show that the price the farmers get is not the cause of the high retail price of meats is afforded by comparing the price at which meats are retailed to the consumer on the Isthmus of Panama by the commissary department with the prices paid by Washington consumers for like cuts. I will insert a table in the RECORD showing these prices, and the facts set out therein may surprise you. It shows that we are paying in Washington from 31 to 200 per cent more than is charged to the consumer on the Isthmus:

Table C.

Article.	Retail price, delivered to consumer by commissary department, Isthmian Commission.	Retail price, delivered to consumer by Washington retail dealers.	Per cent of increase.
Mutton:	Pound.	Pound.
Stewing	$0.06	$0.12½	108

To understand the full importance of these figures you must take into consideration the fact that the meats sold on the Isthmus are bought from the Beef Trust, and therefore include the price received by the farmer; the expense and profits of the Beef Trust; the cost of transportation from New York to the Isthmus, a distance of nearly 2,000 miles; the expensive cold-storage proposition that must be provided in transporting it and keeping in a tropical country after it arrives; and the cost of distributing it to the consumer. But for the expense incurred in handling the meat after it reaches New York it could no doubt be sold for considerable less than the prices quoted. Those who have just returned from the Isthmus and who have investigated the matter thoroughly say that the quality of the meat sold there is as fine as any sold here in Washington.

I think you will all agree with me that if meats were sold as cheaply in this country as they are on the Isthmus, even allowing for the added expense of transportation, icing, and so forth, necessarily incurred by the commissary department, there would be little cause to complain of the high cost of meat.

It seems to me that the figures I have shown in the tables inserted in the RECORD prove conclusively that the high cost of meats and other farm products is caused by what is added to the price of the product after it leaves the farmers' hands, and that it must be accounted for by our expensive and indefensible system of distribution.

But whoever is responsible for the increase in the price of the product after it leaves the farm, one thing is certain, that to punish the farmer for the high cost of living by putting his products on the free list, without investigation or information, is like arresting an innocent man and throwing him into jail without a hearing or a trial while the real culprit goes free.

I realize how futile it is to stand here and plead the cause of the western farmer before a political party intoxicated with power and that always has been controlled by the solid South and the great cities and congested centers of the country, combining all the elements that are consumers only of the products of the great West, and who, therefore, have no other interest in the agricultural industry than to make its products as cheap as possible, and then to create conditions under which the farmers will have to purchase their products at the highest possible price. I know this will seem like a rather strong statement of the case, but it is abundantly borne out by the speeches that have recently been made on the floor of this House. Let me quote some of them.

The gentleman from New York, the Hon. FRANCIS B. HARRISON, in speaking for the Canadian reciprocity treaty on February 13, 1911, said:

> The recent election, bringing about the first overthrow the Republicans have sustained in many years, was freighted with one great demand—the demand of the people of our congested cities to take the taxes off from food and clothing. In response to that mandate we are now taking the first step. From the east side of New York City a million voices are raised in appeal to you that you should make this bill a law. From every city in the East they cry out to you.

Speaking on the woolen bill, on July 30, 1912, he said:

> This Democratic Congress was sent here by the consumers of the country and not by the producers. Your Tariff Board report, to which you make reference, is a producers' report. It deals exclusively with the difference in the cost of production, if any, here and abroad.

This gentleman, voicing the sentiments of the Democratic Party, does not want any investigation as to the cost of production on the farm. He does not want to know whether the farmer is getting too much or too little for his products. All he wants is that the farmer shall be compelled to sell his products cheaper than he does now, regardless of consequences.

Another gentleman from New York, the present governor of that State, while discussing the tariff question on the floor of this House on August 5, 1912, said:

> The Democrats must keep the tariff to the front. It will never be settled until it is settled right, and it will never be settled right until it is settled by the friends of the consumers.

The genial leader of the majority, the Hon. OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD, said on June 10, 1912:

> I believe in relieving the men who work in the factories and in the foundries and who have to purchase their daily bread.

And so I might continue to quote; but what is the use, for the Democratic Party not only declares that it stands for cheaper food, but that its method of accomplishing this is to reduce or cut off entirely the duty on farm products, which shows that it means to make the farmers stand the reduction, for, as Mr. HARRISON says, the Democratic Party is under no obligation to the producers of these products, but only to the consumers. Well, these gentlemen may be able to force down the prices of the farmers' products enough to satisfy even their unreasonable views and policy, only to find their own constituents without the means to buy them at any price. History has always repeated itself, and always will as often as like conditions prevail.

Many of the would-be reformers, whom nature has endowed with more ability to talk than to think, tell us that the remedy for the high cost of living is to get two or three million city people to go back to the farms and raise more farm products at a less price—which would mean at no profit—in order that those who remain in the city might have their cost of living reduced. The people who thus moved into the country, in order to live, would have to work from 12 to 16 hours a day and practice the strictest economy. If they did this and managed intelligently, the cost of food might be reduced, but even then the plan would utterly fail unless the farmers could buy as much cheaper as they would have to sell cheaper, and in order to make this possible the city people would have to work as many hours per day as the farmers—say 4 hours longer than they do now—and then do without many of the luxuries they now indulge in. This might make the plan feasible and successful, but no reformer of social conditions has ever suggested that any other class of people should be compelled to work as long hours as the farmer has to do or get along with so few luxuries. The workers of every other industry or calling are demanding shorter hours and higher wages—which means an increased cost of their products—and as they are now pretty thoroughly organized they are gradually enforcing their demands. At the same time they are demanding cheaper food, and instead of even attempting to remedy the evils of our absurdly expensive system of distribution they propose to make the farmer carry the load. In other words, they propose to get their increased leisure and comforts at the expense of the farmers, regardless of the fact that the burdens of this kind already borne by the farmer is the cause of his sons and daughters leaving him to become competitors in the already overcrowded occupations of the cities.

No country can long be prosperous that does not maintain a proper balance between agriculture and the industrial occupations, and that balance has already been seriously affected in this country. If you want to stop the steady flow of farmers' sons and daughters to the cities, all you have to do is to so legislate as to assure to the farmer safe and reasonable profits for his industry and the trick is turned.

Some would-be reformers tell us that if we could furnish proper amusement for the farmers' families their young people would not leave the farm. Such talk is the sheerest nonsense. If you can bring about conditions under which the farmers will have a few dollars left after paying for the absolute necessaries, they will look out for their own amusements and ask no favors.

Nero tried to pacify a robbed and dissatisfied public by various kinds of amusements, but the plan failed as it always will. All the farmer asks is justice and a fair field in which to work, and if you deny him this you will not only ruin his industry but you will make it impossible for any other industry long to prosper. [Loud applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES].

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS].

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, under the general leave to print already granted, I submit for printing in the RECORD an article written by Hon. William Randolph Hearst to the editor of the Washington Post.

The article referred to is as follows:

NEW YORK, April 18, 1913.

To the Editor of the Washington Post:

Mr. Wilson lately revived the ancient Federalist custom of a speech to the assembled representatives in Congress, personally instructing them upon their duties and obligations to the administration.

It seems to me that the significance of this presidential performance has been largely overlooked.

JEFFERSON'S COURSE.

Is it not worthy of note that the last President to indulge in this formal procedure was John Adams, the last Federalist President, and that the first President to dispense with this ceremonious custom was Thomas Jefferson, the first Democratic President?

In the early days of this Republic there were two distinct lines of thought in the politics of the country, and two different bodies of citizens supporting these lines of thought.

TWO OPPOSING VIEWS.

On the one hand were the Democratic Republicans, who believed both in the letter and in the spirit of the Declaration of Independence, who were convinced that a new order of things was both advisable and advantageous, that the old-established systems of government by a superior class were failures, and that government by all the people was not only the most just and righteous but the most practical and successful form of government that could be devised.

On the other hand were the Federalists, who regarded radical innovations in government as more or less dangerous, and believed that for the American Government to be entirely safe and sound it must be modeled largely upon the established forms of government in the older European countries.

DREAMS HAVE COME TRUE.

This division of opinion and policy, even among patriots at that early date, was entirely natural and temperamental. Men of conservative thought, like Hamilton, were Federalists, and believed in the established order of things. Men of original and adventurous thought, like Jefferson, believed in a new and better order of things and dreamed of a greater and nobler nation than had ever been known, built on the firm foundations of justice and equality, of liberty and opportunity.

These dreams have come true; but in those early days there was not sufficient experience in popular government to guide all men to a confidence in the new order of things, and so the Federalists, with their belief in the established order of things, continued for a while to form a formidable party.

At this day Federalists still exist, but not in sufficient numbers to form a separate party, and so they are found scattered through the other parties, and sometimes in commanding positions in one of the other parties.

FOND OF ENGLISH SYSTEM.

The distinguishing mark of the Federalists from the beginning has been their special admiration for, and confidence in, the English system of government. Hamilton, the real creator of the Federalist Party, carried an inclination to incorporate the English procedure into our American form of government so far that he was accused by Jefferson of a secret desire to make the United States a monarchy.

We can hardly believe that even the most extreme Federalist would have been willing to go to that length, but most certainly the Federalists as a whole were apparently unable to understand and appreciate the beauty, the simplicity, the humanity, and the practicability of Jefferson's distinctively American ideas, and turned invariably to the more autocratic and aristocratic methods of the mother country.

The Federalist method of a speech by the President to Congress was a mere adaptation of the British usage of a speech to Parliament from the throne.

The aristocratic Adams approved it and practiced it.

But Thomas Jefferson, who founded the Democratic Party and introduced into American political life the simplicity which has since characterized it, adopted the modest democratic method of writing a message to Congress, expressing his views and offering suggestions for legislation.

RETURN TO THE SPECTACULAR.

It is a singular thing that for 113 years great Democrats, from Andrew Jackson to Grover Cleveland, and great Republicans, from Abraham Lincoln to Theodore Roosevelt, should have followed the simple, modest, and democratic method of Thomas Jefferson, and that only in the Democratic administration of our day is return made in this presidential speech to the ceremonies and somewhat spectacular procedure of the close of the eighteenth century.

President Wilson, in the introduction of his speech to Congress, explained his somewhat sensational performance by stating that he wished to show that "a President was a human being."

Since the time of John Adams there has been no one in public life except Mr. Wilson who believed that a President could possibly be considered anything else than a human being.

NOT EXEMPT FROM HUMAN WEAKNESSES.

If, however, Mr. Wilson's suspicion is correct—and there has lately arisen among independent and intelligent American citizens a belief that there is something superhuman and supernatural about a President—Mr. Wilson has effectively dispelled that superstition by proving that a President can possess all the purely human weaknesses, including vanity and a craving for newspaper notoriety.

The significance and importance, however, of President Wilson's performance lie mainly in the federalistic flavor of it, and in the possible consequences to the American Nation of a Chief Executive with a federalistic viewpoint.

The idea that a ruler must occasionally reveal himself to the people or to their representatives in order to prove that he is merely human is a charmingly federalistic conception.

The disposition to revert to the formality and ceremony of the old-established English system is another characteristic indication of a federalistic frame of mind.

A POSSIBLE DANGER.

This mental disposition is not so vital, unless it is indicative of the peculiar inability of the old-time Federalist to understand and appreciate the immense superiority of our own American ideas and institutions—unless it expresses an unfortunate and unwarrantable tendency to overestimate the notably inferior institutions of foreign nations, particularly of England.

The fear that Mr. Wilson's federalistic frame of mind may threaten exactly this danger is strengthened by other of Mr. Wilson's actions and utterances.

Mr. Wilson gained his degree of doctor of philosophy by an essay which contended flagrantly in the face of fact that the English parliamentary form of government was superior to the American congressional system.

AMERICAN SYSTEM SUPERIOR.

The very obvious and almost universally admitted truth is that there is no such practical and efficient system in the world as our American congressional system, with its committee organization.

As a matter of fact, England at this day, in order to perform her pressing governmental business, is compelled to modify her parliamentary system which Mr. Wilson so admired, and to consider the adaptation and adoption of the American system which Mr. Wilson so disparaged and despised.

To be sure, this essay of Mr. Wilson's was written some time ago, and might be considered an early and outgrown expression of a federalistic affection for England were it not that Mr. Wilson has only comparatively recently delivered an address in which he declares that he gets his information on world events from the columns of the London Weekly Times.

The London Times proudly advertises this utterance in a circular, which reads as follows: "Some short time ago President Woodrow Wilson, when speaking at the annual dinner of bankers of New York, said:

"'To get the news of the world I subscribe for the weekly edition of the London Times.'"

The manager of the London Times then proceeds to dilate upon his departments of world news and world business, and closes with the polite suggestion that the "inclosed form should be used by intending subscribers."

Certainly the London Times is, or at least once was, an excellent paper, but there is no publication on the face of the earth so completely and absolutely saturated with the English prejudice toward all other countries, and toward America in particular, as the London Times.

ALARMING TO AMERICANS.

In view of which, it is astonishing, if not alarming, to American citizens to think that their Chief Executive gets his "news of the world" and, to a certain extent, his views of the world and his views of business from the columns of this biased English journal.

Some American citizens are followers of Jefferson and have studied the attitude of England in Jefferson's time during the Revolutionary War and the War of 1812. Other American citizens are disciples of Abraham Lincoln and have read of the acts and animus of England during the Civil War. All of these citizens will wonder what effect this prejudiced English information of "politics" and "business" from a colored English source will have upon the mind of an American President. Many American citizens will seriously consider whether this insidious English influence will tend to prejudice the presidential mind against the methods and systems and institutions of his own country, no matter how provenly successful those institutions may be.

Many thoughtful citizens will be led to ponder on how far Mr. Wilson's attitude toward the American protective tariff is influenced by his federalistic frame of mind and his English sources of information.

Mr. Wilson's opposition to the protective tariff is not inherently or essentially Democratic.

WILSON AN ENGLISH FREE TRADER.

Jefferson, the founder of the Democratic Party, recognized the principle of protection and advocated discriminating duties in favor of American shipping and reciprocity treaties in favor of American trade.

Mr. Wilson is fundamentally opposed to the principle of protection, and his idea of radical, ruthless tariff reduction is but an expression of the English free-trade theories of Cobden and Mill.

Mr. Wilson is an English free trader.

He may obscure his utterances, but he can not conceal his acts.

Mr. Wilson's political economy is the political economy of another nation and of another age.

It is the political economy of a nation that is passing and of an age that is past.

Mr. Wilson's theories are the theories of books, and of British books, but of British books that are no longer believed by the patriotic and practical and progressive Englishmen of to-day.

The United States of America have given an example to the world in progress and prosperity, in advancement and enlightenment, in happiness and contentment.

The nations of the world have turned toward this country in admiration and amazement.

The methods and systems and institutions of our country have been studied and imitated in every foreign nation, except, perhaps, in England.

FEDERALISTS ALONE IN THE DARK.

England is slow to learn and reluctant to learn, but, nevertheless, she is beginning to learn, and the most advanced and intelligent thought in England to-day is in favor of an imperial federation, with free trade among its component States and colonies, but with a policy of protection toward the rest of the world.

Germany and France have long prospered under protection, and through intelligent appreciation and imitation of other American ideas and institutions.

The realization that this country is the greatest country in the world and the appreciation of the causes which have made it the greatest country in the world are almost universal throughout the world, except among the few remaining Federalists of the United States of America.

If there is to be tariff modification, the modern American policy should be the original Democratic policy of reciprocity and discriminating duties in favor of American products, American manufactures, American commerce, and American trade.

In our tariff we have a weapon with which we can withstand the tariff weapons of other nations, but we must not abandon our weapons until other nations are ready to abandon theirs.

WHAT BECOMES OF RECIPROCITY?

In the reduction of our tariff through reciprocity we have a method by which we can compel the reduction of the tariff of other nations, but of what value will be a policy of reciprocity which does not go into effect until after our tariff reductions have been made?

If we are to make tariff concessions which will be encouraging to the products and valuable to the producers in other nations, we should compel reciprocal concessions which will be equally stimulating to the products, equally beneficial to the producers, to the farmers, to the manufacturers, and the laborers in our own country.

Through reciprocity tariff reduction can be made coincident and coextensive with trade expansion.

Through reciprocity the injury to our manufacturers, to our farmers, to our laborers, through the invasion of our markets by foreign products, would be compensated for by the advantages obtained by our manufacturers, our farmers, and our laborers in the opening of foreign markets to our trade and our produce.

MOTIVE AN UNSELFISH ONE.

In the advocacy of intelligent reciprocity rather than reckless and ruthless tariff reduction and commercial destruction I have no selfish motive.

I have cattle ranches in Mexico, and it is proposed under Mr. Wilson's policy to bring beef free into the United States.

It would advantage me considerably, from a merely sordid point of view, to have Mexican beef allowed free into the United States market.

But as a patriotic American citizen and a Jeffersonian Democrat I do not believe that Mexican beef or any other Mexican product should be allowed free into the markets of the United States until American goods are allowed free into the markets of Mexico.

Under Mr. Wilson's program it is proposed to allow white paper free into the markets of the United States from Canada.

I use over $6,000,000 worth of white paper every year, and, from a merely selfish financial point of view, it would benefit me enormously to have white paper admitted free into the markets of the United States.

NATION'S INTERESTS ABOVE PARTY.

But, again, as a patriotic American citizen and a Jeffersonian Democrat, I do not believe that white paper or any other Canadian product should be admitted free into the United States until the products of the United States, or at least corresponding products of the United States, are admitted free into the markets of Canada.

The Canadians scornfully rejected our proposals of reciprocity.

Are we in return to give them the full advantage of reciprocity without securing any reciprocal advantages for ourselves?

I am loath to criticize the policy of the Democratic Party or of any man whom I labored to elect, but I am an American first and a Democrat afterwards, and I can not consider the interests of my party above the interests of my country.

I shall hope to see the Democratic Party fulfill its duty and rise to its opportunity.

I shall support it gracefully when it is right, but criticize it regretfully when it is wrong, and I shall continue to implore it not to be led by a federalistic fetich away from the fundamental principles of Thomas Jefferson, who was always not only a great Democrat but a great American.

WILLIAM R. HEARST.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I know that no words that I can say will prevent the passage of this bill. The legislative steam roller, well oiled and ready for operation, is waiting on the other side of the House to roll over us and effectually silence all opposition. Nevertheless, I feel that I can not discharge the constitutional duty which devolves upon me as a Member of this House without recording my protest against the passage of this most unwise, unjust, unscientific, and unstatesmanlike tariff measure.

It would seem that the lessons of our political history ought to give pause to the gentlemen on the other side before they pass a bill fraught with such certain disaster to the industrial prosperity of the country as is this bill. Irrespective of the merits of the controversy as to whether an ultimate free trade or a protective policy is best for this country, our history makes clear, I think, that when industries have been built up and have for years been operated under a protective tariff, to suddenly remove that protection or to so suddenly reduce the tariff as to amount to revolution, the result always has been and always must be widespread and terrible disaster. If it should be determined that it is for the interest of this country to go to a free-trade basis, the result should not be reached all at once, but very gradually. The reductions in the tariff provided by this bill, instead of becoming operative all at once, should be spread over a period of five years, unless its authors intend to bring a terrible shock, if not total destruction, to many of the great industries of the country. If this bill is passed into law there is nothing surer than that the people of the country will have another object lesson like that of 1894 to 1897 of the harmful results that always have come and always will come from radical and sudden reductions in the tariff upon the products which our people are producing. The result must be the stopping of the wheels of industry, for a time at least if not permanently. Our industries are all adjusted to the conditions produced by the protective tariff; wages, cost of material, salaries, and everything making up the cost of production are determined in very many of our industries, if not in all of them, by our tariff policy. Remove the protection heretofore afforded them, or greatly reduce the duties, and there must inevitably be a lowering in the price of wages to somewhere near the standard of our competitors, as well as in the cost of all the other things that enter into production. This means an inevitable business and industrial stagnation with consequent labor struggles, lack of employment, and the privation and suffering that comes with it. There is nothing surer, in my judgment, than that the passage of this bill into law will shut up many of the mills and factories and slow everything down, just as the Wilson bill did in 1894. There can be no revival from the resulting depression until an adjustment in the cost of wages and other elements that enter into production have been reached. Only the blindest adhesion to a theory, stripped of all practical experience or knowledge, could hide from the gentlemen on the other side of the House the results to flow from their action.

I belong to that class who for a few years past have been inveighed against, ridiculed, and condemned by many of those who think they see a new light. I am a protectionist and believe firmly in the doctrine that it is for the country's interest, and for the interest of every part of it, too, that our people should buy as far as possible the products of our own labor. This not only keeps our enormous labor population employed, but it keeps our money at home; and individuals, as well as nations, grow rich and prosperous not by what they buy of others, but by what they produce and sell to others.

Nothing seems clearer than this: When you buy any article, whether of necessity or luxury, you are paying not just for the material that is in it, you are paying for the labor that it cost to produce it. When you buy domestic goods you are buying domestic labor, and when you buy foreign goods you are buying foreign labor. This is elementary. Everybody who thinks ought to know this. Now, the capacity of this country for consumption is very large, but it is by no means unlimited, and when the law makes it for the interest of our people to buy foreign goods, that simply means that the law makes it for the interest of our people to buy foreign labor to the exclusion of our own. The people have only so much money to spend in supplying their wants, and whatever they spend for the products of foreign labor obviously can not be spent for the products of our own labor. Supplying our necessities by buying foreign goods means by so much displacing the products of the labor of this country. It has been estimated by some of the friends of this bill that one of the effects of it will be increased importations of products affected by the proposed changes in the tariff to an amount equal to one-third of the total consumption of those products. I think it will turn out, if this bill becomes a law, that the increase in importations will be in much greater proportion than that. In many cases all the goods we consume will be imported. But in any case, so far as we import foreign goods, do not forget that we are paying for foreign labor, and so far as these foreign goods displace goods of home manufacture they are displacing American labor, which must inevitably be turned out upon the street. The American laborer will have been driven from the employment with which he is familiar by the action of his own Government, which has furnished him no other job, no other means of livelihood, and has not created conditions which will enable anybody to supply him with such employment. The man who has any practical knowledge of business and knows what must be the inevitable result of the passage of this bill is overwhelmed with feelings of sorrow and regret that our country must pass through another period when many of our industries will be idle, when want and hunger will stalk abroad in the land, and when soup houses will keep the breath of life in the idle until our people come again to another period of industrial sanity and intelligence.

I wish now to consider in detail some of the provisions of this bill, and especially those which will disastrously affect the industries of my own section.

SUGAR.

California has, since the passage of the Dingley bill, been a large and increasing producer of beet sugar. There are now 13 factories in the State, as follows:

Alameda Sugar Co., Alameda County; Anaheim Sugar Co., Orange County; American Beet Sugar Co., Chino, San Bernardino County; American Beet Sugar Co., Oxnard, Ventura County; Corcoran Sugar Co., Kings County; Holly Sugar Co., Orange County; Los Alamitos Sugar Co., Orange County; Spreckels Sugar Co., Monterey County; San Joaquin Valley Sugar Co., Kern County; Santa Ana Cooperative Sugar Co., Orange County; Southern California Sugar Co., Orange County; Sacramento Valley Sugar Co., Glenn County; and Union Sugar Co., Santa Barbara County.

These factories produced in 1912 168,765 tons (of 2,000 pounds) of sugar, consumed 1,037,499 tons (of 2,000 pounds) of beets, which were grown on 112,000 acres of the land of the State. This industry represents a total investment in California of $19,904,823. As indicating the value to our State of this industry I call attention to the following statement of—

Local expenditures in 1912.

For beets (showing the total value of the crop to the farmers of the State)	$6,701,582.82
For labor in factories and fields	3,939,165.01
For railroad freights	1,811,112.46
For fuel oil	503,789.90
For lime rock	211,162.69
For bags	391,564.93
For other supplies	542,598.11
Total	14,100,922.92

We think in California that this industry should not be needlessly sacrificed to meet the views of the refiners of cane sugar and the importing interests. Who is paying for the expensive propaganda lately being carried on to remove the tariff on sugar? Not the consumer, for sugar is furnished to consumers in this country cheaper, with two or three exceptions, than anywhere else in the civilized world. This propaganda is being carried on and paid for by the refining interests, who are, of course, interested in cheaper foreign raw cane sugar and in removing from their field the only competitors they have—the beet-sugar factories of the country.

A little attention to the history of sugar prices must convince anyone that free sugar means destruction to the beet-sugar industry of this country. Owing to the high percentage of sugar in our beets—sometimes as high as 22 per cent—the factories of California can survive free sugar if any can. But many of our factories, if not all of them, would find it impossible to run at a profit unless there is a great readjustment of wages and a lowering of the price of beets. Actual cost per pound at factory of producing beet sugar was estimated by an expert in the business in 1909 at 2.88¼ cents. In the year 1912 the cost was certainly more than this. Last week refined sugar was selling in New York at 4.06 cents per hundred pounds wholesale. Remove the duty—1.90 cents per pound on refined sugar—and it is easy to see what would become of the beet-sugar man. There are other elements to be taken into consideration. For example, beet sugar has to be sold at from 10 cents to 30 cents per 100 pounds less than cane sugar, or an average of 20 cents per 100 pounds. Assuming that the freights from beet-sugar factories to market are the same as from the refineries, the figures would stand thus:

	Cents.
Cost of producing beet sugar	2.88¼
Present wholesale price in New York	4.06
Less duty	1.90
	2.16
Less differential	.20
	1.96
Loss	.92¼

If it can be claimed that sugar prices at present are abnormally low, let us take another date—say, January 1, 1912:

	Cents.
Wholesale price of granulated in New York	4.75
Less duty and differential	2.10
	2.65
Cost of producing beet sugar	2.88¼
Loss	.23¼

I think the year 1912 was a normal year in sugar prices, and I have seen no figures by any authority on the subject showing that beet sugar has been produced in this country at a less average price than 2.65 cents per pound. Some of the factories might be able to meet these figures, but most of them could not and without protection would be obliged to suspend operations.

Is this result desired by the people of the United States? I do not believe it. It is not only not for the interest of the people of California, but it is not for the interest of the people of any part of the country that the beet-sugar factories should be put out of business. They have been the only regulator of prices in this country. In the fall, when the product of the beet-sugar factories have come upon the market, prices always drop, and remain low as long as they are in the market. Any unprejudiced student of the subject, I think, must conclude that a removal of the tariff, thus eliminating the bulk of the beet-sugar product, would not be to the ultimate advantage of the consumers of this country. Its only competitor, the beet-sugar factories, out of the way and the International Sugar Trust, which controls prices everywhere else in the world but here, would fix the price of our sugar, and be assured it would not be lower to the consumer than it is now.

Instead of destroying our domestic sugar industry in a vain effort to secure cheaper sugar for the consumer, the wise business policy for us is to foster and stimulate our domestic production in every possible way. Germany has been doing this with splendid results. She has gradually increased her production until now it has reached 2,500,000 tons annually. She not only has a prohibitive protective tariff, but formerly paid a bounty to stimulate production. If the present policy of protection could be continued for another 15 years and it was known now that this would be the policy, at the end of that time we would, by the natural increase in production, be producing in this country and our colonial dependencies enough sugar to supply our people with the total amount consumed. There is practically no limit to the possible increase in the production of beet sugar.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYES. Yes.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. What proportion of the sugar of the United States at this time is made from beets?

Mr. HAYES. I will produce those figures in a moment.

Our total consumption of sugar for 1913 is estimated at 3,675,000 tons.

I might say that in California there will be a greater increase than is figured upon on account of the dry weather there, which will prevent in places where the sugar factories are in operation, for instance, the planting of the usual amount of beans, and the farmers will put in beets in place of those beans, because they can get the water to irrigate them and it will be profitable to irrigate them, whereas it would not be to irrigate beans.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. WEAVER). Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYES. Yes.

Mr. QUIN. What per cent of the sugar produced in the United States is beet sugar?

Mr. HAYES. I will give the gentleman the figures.

The sources of supply under present tariff conditions are as follows:

	Tons.
Louisiana	300,000
Beet sugar	625,000
Porto Rico	300,000
Philippines	200,000
Hawaii	500,000
Total domestic	1,925,000
Cuba	1,650,000
All other countries	100,000
Total	3,675,000

If we could keep at home the vast sum that we pay to foreigners for this 1,750,000 tons of foreign sugar, it would be a great business advantage to this country.

There is another strong reason for stimulating the production of beet sugar in this country. A crop of beets is the greatest restorer of a worn-out soil in the world. This has been repeatedly shown, not only in this country but in Germany, France, and other lands. In the last 30 years Germany has increased its crops of wheat, rye, barley, and oats 80 per cent by the culture of sugar beets.

From whatever point the matter is looked at, to destroy this great and growing industry, and by so doing put our people absolutely in the power of the great International Sugar Trust, seems to me a piece of foolish, insane, criminal folly, for which the guilty party will be held by the people strictly to account.

LEMONS.

Lemon culture is one of the new industries in our State. Fifteen years ago lemons for shipment to the eastern markets were almost unheard of, the total production being about 250,000 boxes. In 1911 the crop was 2,273,000 boxes and last year 2,000,000 boxes. The total consumption of lemons in this country is about 4,000,000 boxes. So that we are now producing in California about one half the lemons consumed and are importing the other half almost entirely from Sicily and Italy. In the last three years the acreage planted to lemon trees increased 43 per cent. It is therefore perfectly apparent, since we are known to have two or three hundred thousand acres of land suitable for lemon culture, that under the present conditions in 15 years more we should be producing in California practically all the lemons consumed in this country. Would this not be a most desirable condition of affairs? Would it not be better to be paying the farmers and laborers of southern California for growing our lemons than to pay the Italian and Sicilian for growing them? I venture to think that it would.

What will be the effect upon the lemon industry of the reduction of the tariff from 1½ cents per pound to one-half cent per pound? The ultimate effect will be to confine the California product to the country west of Denver—certainly west of the Missouri River. I think there can be no other result, and a little attention to the figures produced before the Committee on Ways and Means will demonstrate this.

Mr. Powell, whom I regard as the best-posted man in the world on the lemon industry of California, testified before the Ways and Means Committee that the average cost of producing a box of lemons in California was last year $1.88 f. o. b. Mr. Osborn, representing the importing and foreign interests in lemons, testified that it cost $1.65 per box f. o. b. the vessel to produce a box of Sicilian lemons. The freight to any point east of the Missouri River from California is 84 cents per box. The freight on foreign lemons to New York, after deducting all rebates, in 1,000 box lots—and they all come in large lots—is 24 cents per box. Taking the estimate of the representative of each interest of the cost of production the comparison would stand thus:

Cost of production California per box	$1.88
Freight	.84
Laid down east of Missouri River	2.72
Cost of production Sicilian per box	1.65
Freight	.24
Duty at one-half cent per pound per box	.39
Laid down in New York	2.28
Margin in favor of foreign lemons	.44

On this basis in a contest for the lemon market east of the Missouri River it is easy to see what will become of the California lemon. It will not be in it. It can not be marketed in that region in close competition with the foreign article.

Mr. Powell in his testimony before the committee insists that the Osborn figures are much too large and that the real cost of Sicilian lemons is not to exceed 90 cents per box. If Mr. Powell is correct in this, it only makes the case of the California lemon still more desperate. It is only fair to say that Mr. Osborn on his side of the case stoutly declares that Powell's figures as to cost of producing California lemons are much too high, but he does not profess personally to have made any examination of such cost, and bases his statement on old estimates of cost made by others without adequate data, in some cases on results in a single orchard. Such a basis of cost would be manifestly unfair.

Misleading statements have been made based on the results obtained by the Limonera Co., of Santa Paula, Cal., and the large profits made by them on lemons. This orchard I have myself examined. I have no hesitation in saying that it is one of the finest, if not the finest, orchard in the world; certainly I have never seen one so fine. It produces a very large proportion of fancy lemons. It is not a type of the ordinary 10, 20, or 30 acre lemon orchard of California. The facts are that even with a protective tariff of 1½ cents per pound the profits in lemon culture have not been sufficiently large to cause an abnormally large increase in the acreage planted to lemons. Since the passage of the last tariff act the increase in lemon trees is only 43 per cent. This industry has been built up with the protective tariff, the principal factor that made it possible. The present tariff is not large enough to make up the difference in freight and in cost of production here and abroad. Take this protection away, or two-thirds of it away, and the result must be that the industry will languish, if it is not entirely destroyed.

There is a reason for protecting the lemon and other industries of California, I wish to remind the House, that does not exist in most cases; namely, the long and expensive freight haul to reach the principal markets of the country. I believe, and I think the country believe, that in order to somewhat offset this handicap and enable the people of California to develop their industries reasonable protection is justified if it ever is justified. Our opponents are fond of pointing to the Panama Canal and saying, in answer to this, that when that is completed this handicap will be removed. Californians hope that in some commodities the handicap of large freight charges may be lessened, but of course it never will be removed. And as to lemons it will not materially affect the situation. Lemons are a perishable commodity, and the long sea voyage in a tropical climate will increase the loss by decay or increase the cost for transportation on account of the long period of refrigeration, or increase both the loss and the cost of refrigeration, so that in the case of this commodity the great advantage is not apparent. In fact, I do not expect to see lemons shipped by the canal in any large amount.

Mr. Chairman, there are other industries of our State that will be disastrously affected by the passage of this bill, among them olives, olive oil, beans, walnuts, and dried fruits. I will not now discuss them in detail, but will do so when consideration of each is reached under the five-minute rule. The fact that we are far off on the western rim of the continent, far removed from the great consuming markets of the country, seems not to have had any consideration at the hands of the Ways and Means Committee. Most of our great industries will be hard hit by this bill, and the markets of this country which we heretofore have enjoyed under protection will by this bill be largely taken away from us and turned over to the foreigner. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. CURRY].

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Chairman, free trade, or a tariff for revenue only with incidental protection, which is the nearest possible approach to free trade in this country, is a fraud, a delusion, and a snare, and can only be supported by fallacious reasoning.

Political economy, while based on certain fundamental economic axioms and accepted rules of right and wrong governing business dealings between man and man and nation and nation in the production and distribution of wealth, is not an exact science as arithmetic and geometry are exact sciences. Every country must develop a political economy of its own, suitable to its physical conditions and to the occupations, character, and habits of life of its citizens. Experience from the beginning of the Government has proved that a protective tariff is necessary for the prosperity of our people.

Our Government owes its citizens protection from foreign invasion, whether that invasion comes in the shape of bombarding men-of-war and devastating armies, or whether it comes in the shape of passenger and freight ships loaded with cheap labor and cheap goods.

The tariff is not a law of the Medes and Persians. Its very nature makes the revision of at least portions of it frequently necessary to meet changed and changing conditions governing the production and distribution of wealth and the revenue needs of the Government; but in any revision of the tariff the principle of protection to home industry—to American labor and American capital—should always be kept in view. The first tariff act under the Constitution, in 1789, recognized this principle, and, among other reasons for its enactment, stated one to be for "the encouragement and protection of manufactures." From that day to this the material welfare of the people of the United States has always wonderfully developed and their manufacturing and agricultural industries have prospered under the policies of a protective tariff, while a tariff for revenue only, with incidental protection, has always proved disastrous to the prosperity of the country and has resulted in financial panics and terrible business distress.

The present tariff should be revised, but it should not be tampered with under excitement. Changes should not be made under the influence of partisan fervor, or enthusiasm, or byplay, but should be made only after calm and serious consideration as to the effect it will have on the revenue of the Government and the prosperity and happiness of the people.

I believe the time has come when reciprocity trade treaties should be made the handmaiden of our protective-tariff policy.

I recognize the fact that the tariff should protect an industry or product only as long as it needs protection and for the minimum amount necessary to insure it against unprofitable competition with foreign articles or products in the American market, and that an American product or manufactured article that is wholesaled for exportation cheaper than it is wholesaled for home consumption should be placed on the free list.

Some sections of the Underwood bill I should like to vote for, but you are depriving me of that privilege by forcing it through the House as a whole; and as a whole it will cheapen men more than it will cheapen commodities; it will throttle American enterprise and strangle American industry, and it will not produce the wherewithal with which to purchase the "full market basket" you so boastfully proclaim it will provide. The present method of revising the tariff can not but be as it always has been—unsatisfactory.

On account of the lack of definite information as to the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, and on account of the many diverse interests of the different sections of the United States, it is almost impossible for Congress, as a body, to frame an equitable and just tariff law covering all protected articles and articles on which are charged an import duty for revenue only. I hope the time will come in the not far distant future when a nonpartisan board or commission of tariff experts, after a thorough investigation of conditions and of the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, will report their findings to Congress, and a just tariff measure will be enacted, and that it will be adopted schedule by schedule and item by item; to be changed from time to time, a schedule at a time or an item at a time, as conditions and occasion and the welfare of the people may require. Enacting an entire new tariff law, including in it all the articles on which a duty is levied, is wrong. The Members of Congress can not master all the details of such a bill during one session of Congress, and with the exception of those particular items in the bill that will affect their personal calling or business, the people are not given sufficient time to inform themselves as to the effect the measure will have on their prosperity and happiness.

Protection to American industry has resulted in protection to American labor and a high rate of wages and reasonable hours of labor, as well as protection to American capital and the encouragement of American enterprise.

Our internal commerce amounts to more than the combined international commerce of all other nations, of which we also have our share, and it certainly, therefore, must be worthy of our first consideration and protection.

The railroad mileage of the United States is one-half of the railroad mileage of the world, and our country yearly produces one-half of the mineral wealth, one-third of the agricultural wealth, and one-third of the manufacturing wealth of the world, and this has grown from small beginnings under the fostering care of a protective tariff.

The success of any project or enterprise depends on proper organization, intelligent direction, unity of action, and favorable conditions.

Organized labor has done more to shorten the hours of labor, increase the wages, and better the conditions of the American working man and woman than has any other single influence, but without the protection to American industry extended by the tariff the efforts of organized labor could not have achieved the success it has in this country. The protective tariff made the conditions for organized labor favorable. When that protection is withdrawn the condition of the American artisan will retrograde, and will be no better than is that of his fellow in Great Britain.

Cromwell once said: "If there be anyone who makes many poor to make a few rich, that suits not commonwealth." That statement is as true to-day as it was when Cromwell uttered it.

Some people have referred to the protective tariff as the "mother of trusts and swollen fortunes," and have said that the existence of trusts and overgrown fortunes in our country is directly due to the protective tariff. The fact of the matter is that the patent laws of our country and the corporation laws of some of the States are more responsible for the formation and existence of trusts and the accumulation of great individual fortunes than is the tariff. Placing an article in which they deal and which they manufacture on the free list will not destroy trusts. Neither can any tariff law alone stop the drift toward the centralization of wealth and of power and the accumulation of great fortunes by the few which are sapping the foundation of our general prosperity and threatening the stability of our Government. That will require other remedial legislation; and I may say here that the income tax will not remedy that evil. Great Britain is a free-trade country, and the income tax she levies is burdensome, and yet Great Britain is the home of trusts and of great individual fortunes. Her business organization is founded on trusts. It is true that in our own country many trusts have been immorally and illegally formed, and, in my opinion, the tariff on any trust-controlled article should be lowered, and in many instances repealed. The tariff bill before Congress, if enacted, will not destroy trusts. One of its provisions gives the beet-sugar industry notice to wind up its affairs and get out of business inside of three years, and will destroy the only competitor the Sugar Trust has in this country, and will not in the long run result in the reduction of the price of sugar to the consumer. In my own State of California there are 13 beet-sugar factories, which last year turned out 168,765 tons of sugar, made from 1,037,499 tons of sugar beets, grown on 112,003 acres of land.

The cost of the production of beet sugar in California in the year 1912 was as follows:

For beets	$6,701,582.82
For labor in factories and fields	3,939,165.01
For railroad freights	1,811,112.46
For fuel oil	503,789.90
For lime rock	211,169.09
For bags	391,504.93
For other supplies	542,598.11
Total	14,100,922.32

The amount invested in factories, land, and equipment is $19,904,823.21.

The Alameda Sugar Co. had made arrangements to put up a beet-sugar factory at Meridian, in Sutter County. They contemplated spending $2,000,000 on the plant and acreage. They have stopped construction, although $45,000 worth of steel intended to be used in the construction of the factory is on the ground.

The United States consumes of sugar per annum 3,500,000 tons. It produces of domestic cane from—

	Tons.
Porto Rico	300,000
Louisiana	300,000
Sandwich Islands	550,000
Domestic beet	650,000
Total	1,800,000

The balance, 1,700,000 tons, is obtained chiefly from Cuba.

The domestic cane-sugar supply has reached its limit of productivity. The prospect of making our country self-supplying, therefore, lies in the expansion of the sugar-beet industry.

The refining—so called—of Cuban sugar consists in the decolorizing of it at factories located at a few seaboard points. Nothing is produced, and only factory wages are distributed.

The beet-sugar industry employs the farmer to produce the beets from which it extracts the sugar. There is surely a difference of advantage to our Nation between merely washing raw cane sugar grown and purchased abroad and the manufacture of beet sugar, which is the product of beets grown on our soil, and for which the farmer receives at the very lowest price 2 cents a pound.

Any legislation which will destroy or prevent the expansion of the beet-sugar industry will be detrimental to the State of California and to the Nation.

It is not true that with the removal of the tariff on sugar the people will save $52,000,000 per year, that being the present total of sugar duties. The cost of sugar will follow the law of supply and demand, and to the extent that the present domestic supply is reduced to that extent must foreign sources be drawn upon, and with this increased demand the price of raw sugar will advance.

If the Government desires to cheapen the cost of sugar to the consumer—and it is as cheap to-day as it ever has been—its policy should be to encourage the multiplying of beet-sugar factories and let the competition between them take care of the selling price, as has been abundantly demonstrated during the past two years.

Without a due measure of protection the beet-sugar industry can not continue, and its stoppage means a check to the prosperity of the farmers and communities where beet-sugar factories have been located.

Mr. Chairman, I have a telegram here from Mr. L. B. Mallory, chief clerk of the Assembly of California, which I will read:

SACRAMENTO, CAL., April 22, 1913.

Hon. C. F. CURRY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

I have the honor to hand you herewith copy of assembly joint resolution No. 18, adopted by senate and assembly and approved by the governor, relative to the protection of the California beet-sugar industry in the enactment by Congress of laws affecting tariffs on imports into the United States.

Whereas in the process of tariff revision by Congress, the indicated tendency is toward an abolition of all duties on imported sugar; and
Whereas such a policy would be calamitous to the cane and beet sugar industry of the Nation at large, and especially to the beet-sugar business of the State of California, which produces 165,000 tons per annum, or one-quarter of the beet-sugar output of the United States; and
Whereas the annual consumption of sugar in our country is now 3,500,000 tons per annum supplied, viz, from domestic cane grown in Porto Rico, Louisiana, and Sandwich Islands 1,100,000 tons, from beet sugar manufactured in 16 States 650,000 tons, making 1,750,000 tons, the balance being purchased from foreign countries and refined by a few corporations on the Atlantic seaboard, who are clamoring for free sugar in order that they may check the further invasion of their markets by the constantly growing beet-sugar industry; and
Whereas our Nation's beet-sugar output has increased from 40,000 tons in 1897 to 650,000 tons in 1912, a rate of increase greater than can be shown in any country in Europe during an equal period of time, while our cane-producing districts have apparently reached the limit of their productivity; and
Whereas this country should, and can, become self-supplying in the matter of sugar through the development of the beet-sugar industry, now involving the use of only 450,000 acres of land against 274,000,000 acres adapted to the cultivation of the sugar beet; and
Whereas the development of the industry is checked by the menace of a free-sugar bill, which will subject this product to competition with cane and beet sugar produced under the low-wage conditions in the Tropics and Europe, and at prices delivered at our seaboards lower than, under our conditions, is paid to the farmers of our State for the sugar in the beet before it is manufactured: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Legislature of the State of California (a majority of all members elected to senate and assembly voting for the adoption of this resolution and concurring therein) requests the Senate and House of Representatives of Congress at Washington, and the President of the United States, that due regard be had, in the consideration of tariff revision, for the claims of the beet-sugar industry, which is so full of promise to our Nation, and that the principle governing the revision of the tariff in this regard be that the tariff should equalize the difference between the cost of production of sugar at home and abroad.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to each of the Members of Congress from the State of California, to be presented to the President and Congress.

L. B. MALLORY,
Chief Clerk of Assembly.

Under the protection of the tariff the horticultural and agricultural resources of California have been wonderfully developed during the past few years.

Manufactories of all kinds have sprung up over the State. To a great extent this development has been stopped because of the knowledge our people have of the blighting effect the tariff law it is expected this Congress will pass will have on the industries of California.

My State is one of the great bean-producing States of the Union, but the farmers of California can not stand competition with Mexican, Japanese, and Chinese beans with the tariff cut from 45 cents a bushel of 60 pounds to 25 cents a bushel.

Five years ago the Pacific coast had no competition from foreign beans, but beginning with the year 1909 a few beans from Japan made their first appearance in San Francisco. The varieties imported from Japan were at that time unknown and did not meet with a ready sale, but prices were made that were so attractive that they gradually worked into consumption. For three years—that is, from March, 1910, until March, 1913—the importation of beans from Chile, Mexico, China, and Japan amounted to 207,783 bags of 100 pounds each, or an average of 69,261 sacks a year. These figures explain the situation in a very few words and show how the importations of beans from the Orient, Mexico, and Chile have increased. All of these foreign beans are now known to the trade and are being quoted regularly, the same as are our staple California beans.

If the importation of beans has increased to such proportions paying a duty of 45 cents a bushel of 60 pounds, it can be readily seen that the importation of beans will increase much more and be a much greater menace to the bean-growing industry of not only California but of the Nation if the duty is cut to 25 cents a bushel, as proposed in this law.

Every pound of foreign beans imported into this country takes the place of just so much beans grown on our own soil.

In view of the fact that foreign importations have increased so rapidly under the present duty, why should Congress entertain a proposition of reducing the duty to the detriment of our home product? It certainly can not be for the reason that the price of beans to the consumer is high, for the consumer hardly ever pays more than 3½ cents per pound for beans. At this figure it is a cheap article of food, and it permits of the farmer raising beans at a fair margin of profit to himself. Below this figure, however, it is not a profitable crop to the farmer and would eventually result in driving him out of the business.

In the Sacramento and San Joaquin Valleys there is produced under a normal crop about 2,000,000 sacks of beans, averaging 85 pounds to the sack, and this is less than half of the beans grown in the State. Great as this industry has grown to be in California, I believe that under proper tariff protection the acreage and production would be increased from year to year, but if the duty is reduced as contemplated in the Underwood bill it will result immediately in greatly reducing and curtailing the production and the acreage that will be planted and will eventually drive the bean farmers of California out of business. The price at which beans are now retailed to the consumer makes such a reduction of the tariff unnecessary and the contemplated reduction, if made, will be striking a fatal blow at what promises to be one of the most important farming industries in California. It is beyond my powers of reasoning to understand how the prosperity of this country or of any class of its citizens can be advanced and bettered by putting our people in direct competition with the coolie and cheap labor and cheap lands of Mexico, Chile, and of the Orient.

Over $200,000,000 are invested in the citrous-fruit industry in California; if this bill becomes a law no more acreage will be planted to citrous fruit in California.

The sweeping reduction of the tariff on deciduous fruits will stop further planting and make the present orchards unprofitable.

Within the past few years thousands of acres have been planted to filberts, almonds, and English walnuts. If this bill becomes a law not another acre will be planted, as it will not be profitable to grow them.

The consumption of pure olive oil in the United States is said to be 5,300,000 gallons per annum, of which 800,000 gallons are made from California olives and the balance is imported from Italy, France, Spain, and Greece.

The olive industry has been developed in California during the past few years, and even with the present tariff California olive oil can only be sold at a reasonable profit at a higher price than is commanded by the imported oil.

California now has 9,000 acres of olive orchards in bearing trees and 9,000 acres in growing trees not bearing.

In addition to the 800,000 gallons of olive oil produced in California last year, 4,000 tons of olives were used for pickling.

The reduction of the tariff on olive products proposed in this bill will stop further planting and will make the present orchards unprofitable; but should the present tariff be maintained California would in a few years be able to supply all the olive oil and pickled olives that would be used in the United States and might then stand a reduction without any material injury to the industry.

The Santa Clara and part of the Sonoma Valleys are covered with prune orchards. The small tariff placed on prunes by this bill will reduce the net proceeds of the prune orchardists so much that they will not receive a reasonable profit on the money invested and will discourage further planting.

The placing of wool on the free list will drive the sheepmen out of business, and it is safe to predict that within two years after this bill becomes a law there will not be 500,000 sheep left in the State of California where there is now about 2,500,000.

The California Cap Co., situated at Stege Station, in the city of Richmond, in my district, is very hard hit by the tariff reduction proposed in this bill. That company manufactures blasting caps, and the tariff on them has been cut from $2.25 per 1,000 to $0.70 per 1,000, which means that the company will probably have to go out of business if it stands. There are only three of these companies in the United States. Every blast of powder or dynamite is set off by one of these blasting caps, and it would be a very serious matter for the United States in time of war if it had to depend on foreign importations, as blasting caps are contraband of war.

Placing wood on the free list will not result in materially reducing the price of lumber, but that action must be entirely satisfactory to the Canadian lumbermen.

The Canadian people should congratulate themselves on their foresight in rejecting the reciprocity treaty. The Underwood bill gives them everything the treaty proposed to give them, and more, but does not exact from the Canadians anything in return.

Under this bill the growing of onions, asparagus, and potatoes will no longer be profitable in California.

I have only mentioned a few of the many industries in the State of California that will be made unprofitable by the enactment of the Underwood bill.

California is now one of the best protected and most prosperous States in the Union. Under this bill she will be the State whose agricultural and manufacturing industries are the least protected of any State in the Union. Her manufacturing and agricultural development will cease and her prosperity will be at an end.

The Underwood bill will reduce the revenue of the Government, injure business, put a stop to prosperity, and discourage enterprise, but it will not make it any easier for a man to earn a living for himself and family.

I suppose California ought to be thankful to the framers of this bill for putting teeth on the free list, but whatever gave them the idea that the American people will have any use for teeth, either natural or artificial, after the enactment of this law passes my comprehension, as they certainly will not need them for the purpose of mastication. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 3321, the tariff bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ADJOURNMENT.

Then, on motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD (at 6 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, April 24, 1913, at 11 o'clock a. m.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. HAMLIN: A bill (H. R. 3961) providing for an amendment to section governing the compensation of registers and receivers of United States land offices; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, a bill (H. R. 3962) to amend chapter 90, Twenty-fourth Statutes at Large, page 373, approved February 3, 1887, and fixing term of office of electors of President and Vice President of the United States; to the Committee on Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress.

Also, a bill (H. R. 3973) to simplify procedure in the equity courts of the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. LANGLEY: A bill (H. R. 3974) providing that storekeepers, gaugers, and storekeeper-gaugers shall receive per diem in lieu of subsistence not to exceed $1 per day; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department.

By Mr. CARY: A bill (H. R. 3975) to provide for the testing of electric meters in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Also, a bill (H. R. 3976) to amend an act entitled "An act for the widening of Benning Road, and for other purposes," approved May 16, 1908; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Also, a bill (H. R. 3977) to regulate the operation of automobiles in the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Also, a bill (H. R. 3978) providing for the appointment of inspectors to take the state of the meters for the gas consumers of the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Also, a bill (H. R. 3979) to authorize and direct the Postmaster General to procure postal cars and contracts for hauling them, and appropriating money therefor; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, a bill (H. R. 3980) for the erection of a public building at Milwaukee, Wis.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, a bill (H. R. 3981) providing for equipment of apparatus and operators for radio communication at all life-saving stations; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, a bill (H. R. 3982) to amend section 4488 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

Also, a bill (H. R. 3983) to amend section 4488 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

Also, a bill (H. R. 3984) to regulate the hours of labor on contracts with the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. BLACKMON: A bill (H. R. 3985) to fix the time when the sentence of a party convicted of crime shall begin; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, a bill (H. R. 3986) to repeal an act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy and all amendments thereto; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. CLARK of Florida: A bill (H. R. 3987) to extend the franking privilege to literature published by boards of health of States and Territories in the United States; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. CARTER: A bill (H. R. 3988) for the purchase of a building and lot as a mine-rescue station at McAlester, Okla.; to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

By Mr. RAINEY: A bill (H. R. 3989) to establish in the Department of Agriculture a bureau of farm power; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. WICKERSHAM: A bill (H. R. 3990) to extend the time for the completion of the Alaska Northern Railway, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Territories.

By Mr. BAILEY: A bill (H. R. 3991) to amend an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. CARY: A bill (H. R. 3992) to incorporate the Virginia Terminal Co.; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Also, a bill (H. R. 3993) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to set aside certain lands to be used as a sanitarium by the Fraternal Order of Eagles; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, a bill (H. R. 3994) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to set aside certain lands to be used as a sanitarium by the Loyal Order of Moose; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, a bill (H. R. 3995) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to set aside certain lands to be used as a sanitarium by the Order of Owls; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. HAWLEY: A bill (H. R. 3996) to amend an act granting to the Siletz Power & Manufacturing Co. a right of way for a water ditch or canal through the Siletz Indian Reservation in Oregon; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 3997) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to pay and to distribute the balance now in the Treasury to the credit of the Alsea and other Indians on the Siletz Reservation; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. MOTT: A bill (H. R. 3998) to establish a school of aviation and meteorology at or near the city of Oswego, N. Y.; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MOSS of West Virginia: A bill (H. R. 3999) granting pensions to teamsters of the War of the Rebellion, from 1861 to 1865, inclusive; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. STONE: A bill (H. R. 4229) to increase the compensation of rural mail carriers; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, a bill (H. R. 4230) to provide for admission of volunteer soldiers and sailors who served in the United States Army or Navy in the War with Spain or the Philippine Insurrection, and who are afflicted with tuberculosis, to the United States Public Health Service sanitorium at Fort Stanton, N. Mex.; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. CARY: Resolution (H. Res. 71) directing investigation of the health department of the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. SLAYDEN: Resolution (H. Res. 72) expressing the opinion of the House of Representatives as to the propriety of a joint agreement between the various Governments of America for the mutual guaranty of their sovereignty and territorial integrity; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. CARY: Resolution (H. Res. 73) to direct the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to report to Congress immediately what steps, if any, have been taken by them to enforce section 11 of an act approved March 4, 1913, entitled "An act to direct the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to bring a suit in equity in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia to dissolve the corporation known as the Washington Gas Light Co."; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. RAINEY: Resolution (H. Res. 74) providing for an investigation of the Panama purchase; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. GRIEST: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 72) requesting the President of the United States to recommend plans for the continuance and enlargement of the powers of the Commission on Economy and Efficiency and to submit in budget form an estimate of appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915; to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. NORTON: Memorial of the Legislature of North Dakota, urging Congress to enact a law prohibiting the use of parcel post for the mailing of cigarettes or snuff, or any substitute therefor, within States prohibiting the sale thereof; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BARTHOLDT: A bill (H. R. 4000) granting an increase of pension to Charles Bieger; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

My Mr. CALDER: a bill (H. R. 4001) for the relief of Daniel J. Ryan; to the Committee on Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 4002) for the relief of Paul Puttman; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, A bill (H. R. 4003) granting an increase of pension to John P. Murphy; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CLARK of Missouri: A bill (H. R. 4004) granting an increase of pension to Lewis W. Markwell; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CONNOLLY of Iowa: A bill (H. R. 4005) granting a pension to William Griffin; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 4006) granting a pension to George C. Howland; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FRENCH: A bill (H. R. 4007) granting a pension to Adam Roth; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GORMAN: A bill (H. R. 4008) for the relief of Sandy Crawford; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. HAMLIN: A bill (H. R. 4009) for the relief of R. D. Schackleford; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 4010) for the relief of Joseph W. Hawkins; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 4011) for the relief of Greene County, Mo.; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. CURRY: Petition of E. E. Gaddis, Woodland, Cal., and 367 other citizens of California, protesting against the proposed reduction of the tariff on sugar; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. DALE: Petition of Leopold Cohn, W. J. Wallace, and G. J. Kehoe, of Brooklyn, N. Y., favoring amendment to the income-tax section of the tariff bill exempting mutual life insurance companies from tax; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of employees of the Moehle Lithographic Co., of Brooklyn, N. Y., against the proposed reduction of the duty on lithographed articles; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of Sidney V. Lowell, of Brooklyn, N. Y., favoring the clause in the tariff act prohibiting the importation of aigrettes, etc.; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of the Star Expansion Bolt Co., of New York, N. Y., protesting against the reduction of the duty on sugar; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of Baer Bros., of New York, N. Y., against the reduction of the duty on bronze powders; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. FITZGERALD: Resolutions of the Pennsylvania Millers' State Association, urging that if a tariff be placed on grain an equalizing tariff be placed on the products of grain, etc.; that if products of grain be admitted free, grain be admitted free; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. GERRY: Petition of the Rhode Island Association Opposed to Woman Suffrage, protesting against enfranchisement of women; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, petition of sundry employees of the Warwick and Phenix Lace Mills, of Riverpoint, R. I., against the reduction of the tariff on laces and lace curtains; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of the Rhode Island State Federation of Women's Clubs, protesting against the placing of forest reservations in the control of individual States; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, petition of the Rhode Island State Federation of Women's Clubs, favoring the passage of legislation prohibiting importation of wild-bird plumage; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. GOULDEN: Petitions of 35 citizens of the twenty-third New York district, against including mutual life insurance companies in the income-tax bill; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of 1,000 public-school teachers and students of the city of New York, favoring the passage of section 438 of the tariff bill; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. GRIEST: Petition of the Pennsylvania Millers' Association, urging the establishment of a just parity in the tariff between the raw material and the manufactured products of grain; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. MAGUIRE of Nebraska: Petition of the Commercial Club of Gering, Nebr., protesting against the proposed reduction of the tariff on sugar; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. METZ: Petition of sundry employees of the Moehle Lithographic Co., Brooklyn, N. Y., protesting against the reduction of the tariff on lithographed articles; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. NORTON: Petition of Daniel Freeman, Alice B. Sargent, and others, favoring the passage of legislation prohibiting the importation of the plumage of wild birds for the use of milliners; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. REILLY of Connecticut: Petition of Cigarmakers' Union, No. 42, of Hartford, Conn., against free trade in tobacco and cigars with the Philippine Islands; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of the Woman's Club of Ansonia, Derby, and Shelton, Conn., favoring the clause in the tariff act prohibiting importation of birds for plumage, etc.; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of the Board of Trade of Hardford. Conn., against the location of the headquarters of the customs service at Bridgeport; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. SCULLY: Petition of W. Strother Jones, favoring an amendment to the income-tax section of the tariff bill exempting mutual life insurance companies from taxation; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of the National Association of Window Glass Manufacturers, of Pittsburgh, Pa., against the reduction of the duty on window glass; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of the Pencil Exchange, Jersey City, N. J. favoring tariff reduction in Schedule N, paragraph 473, leads not in wood; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, memorial of sundry citizens of California, favoring an appropriation for the construction of a Millennial Dawn Temple in California in 1915; to the Committee on Appropriations.

Also, petition of the Bronze Powder Works Co., of Elizabeth, N. J., and George Benda, of New York, against the reduction of the duty on bronze powder; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. STEPHENS of California: Petition of Paul Rieger & Co., of San Francisco, Cal., against the reduction of the duty on perfume materials; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of Field & Cramer, of San Francisco, Cal., against making proceeds of life insurance policies paid upon death of person insured income and liable to tax; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of M. A. Newmark & Co., of Los Angeles, Cal., against the tariff on oats and letting in the manufactured article free; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of the San Francisco Labor Council, of San Francisco, against the proposed reduction of salaries of custom-house employees of the port of San Francisco, Cal.; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. WALLIN: Petition of sundry residents of the thirteenth congressional district of New York, protesting against the proposed income tax on mutual life insurance companies; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, April 24, 1913.

The Senate met at 2 o'clock p. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Monday last was read and approved.

DISPOSITION OF USELESS PAPERS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, pursuant to law, a schedule of papers, documents, and so forth, on the files of the Interior Department, which are not needed in the transaction of public business and have no permanent value or historical interest. The communication and accompanying papers will be referred to the Joint Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments. The Chair appoints as the committee on the part of the Senate the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE]. The Secretary will notify the House of Representatives of the appointment of the committee on the part of the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

H. R. 1917. An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914;

H. R. 2441. An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes;

H. R. 2973. An act making appropriations for certain expenses incident to the first session of the Sixty-third Congress, and for other purposes; and

H. J. Res. 62. Joint resolution making an appropriation for defraying the expenses of the committees of the Senate and House of Representatives authorized to attend and represent the Senate and House at the unveiling and dedication of the memorial to Thomas Jefferson at St. Louis, Mo.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

H. R. 2441. An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 2973. An act making appropriations for certain expenses incident to the first session of the Sixty-third Congress, and for other purposes.

H. R. 1917. An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

THE JEFFERSON MEMORIAL COMMITTEE.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 62) making an appropriation for defraying the expenses of the committees of the Senate and House of Representatives authorized to attend and represent the Senate and House at the unveiling and dedication of the memorial to Thomas Jefferson at St. Louis, Mo., was read the first time by its title.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I rise to make a request for unanimous consent to take up at this point this joint resolution, appropriating $2,500, $1,000 to be expended on behalf of the Senate and $1,500 on behalf of the House, to pay the expenses of the committees appointed by the Senate and House to attend and participate in the ceremonies incident to the dedication of the splendid memorial structure erected in St. Louis to the memory of Thomas Jefferson.

The ceremonies are to take place on the 30th of this month, and if the House joint resolution making the appropriation is to be acted upon and the sum to become available it should be acted upon by the Senate to-day.

I hope there will be no objection to the consideration of the joint resolution. I make that request, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution, which will be read at length.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the following sum:

For defraying the expenses of the members of the committees of the Senate and House of Representatives authorized to attend and represent the Senate and House at the unveiling and dedication of the memorial to Thomas Jefferson at St. Louis, Mo., on April 30, 1913, $2,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, of which sum $1,000 shall be accredited to the Senate, to be expended under the direction and by the order of the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate, and $1,500 accredited to the account of and expended under the direction and by the order of the Sergeant at Arms of the House of Representatives, upon vouchers to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and by the Committee on Accounts of the House, respectively.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am not going to object to the immediate consideration of the joint resolution. I merely wish to state that I would not care to have it understood that this is to be pointed to as a precedent, and that bills and resolutions coming from the House will be acted upon without reference to the appropriate committees.

Mr. STONE. I think they ought not to be.

Mr. SMOOT. That is all I desire to say.

Mr. STONE. The exigency in this case is peculiar.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GALLINGER subsequently said: Some time ago I was appointed a member of the committee to attend the Jefferson memorial exercises at St. Louis on the 30th of this month. I find it will be utterly impossible for me to leave at that time, I therefore ask to be excused from service on the committee, and that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] be substituted as a member of the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate has heard the request. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I should like to say just a word on the same matter in regard to which the Senator from New Hampshire has addressed the Senate. I am in the same position as that stated by the Senator from New Hampshire for himself. I was appointed, and I find it impossible to go. I can not leave the business which I have here; and I desire to resign the appointment, and to have some one else appointed in my place. I am not prepared to say whom it will be, but I will bring the matter to the attention of the Chair a little later.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I was one of the Senators designated to go to St. Louis. I find that I can not very well serve upon the committee. I therefore ask to be excused, and that the President of the Senate appoint some other Senator in my place.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair appoints the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] to serve as a member of the Jefferson memorial committee in place of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], who was relieved at his own request.

The Chair also appoints the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] to serve on the Jefferson memorial committee in place of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], who has been excused from service on that committee.

Mr. STONE, at his own request, was excused from further service on the Jefferson memorial committee, and Mr. HUGHES was appointed in his place.

Mr. ROOT, at his own request, was excused from further service on the Jefferson memorial committee, and Mr. ASHURST was appointed in his place.

Subsequently Mr. ASHURST, on his own request, was excused from service on the Jefferson memorial committee.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. NEWLANDS presented a memorial of the Elko County Cattle Association, of Nevada, remonstrating against placing meat and wool on the free list, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WORKS. I present the memorial of James Leonard, of Monrovia, Cal., relative to the duty on citrus fruits. I ask that the memorial be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MONROVIA, CAL.

As a general proposition, it will be conceded that the final and highest development of agriculture means the utilization of land for the crops which it is best adapted to produce. A beneficent autocratic power possessed of a comprehensive knowledge of world agricultural resources and a like inclusive grasp of industrial and transportation factors could so direct operations as to maintain an average of prices, equitable to consumers and agrarians, and could minimize reduplication of labor and eliminate wasteful periodic overproduction on the one hand and periodic scarcity on the other. Such a culmination of the growing recognition of social unity lies very far in the future, but a step in that direction was taken when David Lubin, a former Californian, founded the bureau of world crop reports under the auspices of the Italian Government.

With modifications incident to climate, territorial extent, and culture status, the same general proposition that land areas should be devoted to purposes for which they are especially qualified by inherent characteristics holds good with national divisions.

An import duty acting to create monopoly or entailing excessive cost of farm commodities to consumers would be a rank injustice and an inciting cause to social disturbance, the more so since its action would be insidious and the ultimate effect difficult to trace back to the motive cause.

An import duty functioned merely to establish a domestic agricultural industry is simply a temporary offset against the handicap of a similar foreign industry, fully matured, and as concerns any country of the Old World compared with the United States, operating under the different social conditions of denser populations. The basic justification of such an impost would be the probable resultant establishment of a domestic industry warranted by natural attributes and by home-market demands and which would hold rational promise of permanent adequate development.

If justified by fact as well as by theory, the more obvious effects of such an impost would be:

1. To preserve equilibrium of production by differentiating land areas according to capabilities and thus tend to equalize through long periods average returns for all farm produce.

2. To furnish consumers the particular product affected at a cost at least as low as that of the foreign article and to fully and equitably supply the domestic markets.

Judging the citrus tariff by the above conditions, we find, first, that it is not prohibitive. It hardly compensates for the difference in labor cost of production between domestic and imported fruit. Mediterranean growers still possess the immense advantage of a fully developed industry, cheaper freight rates of steamer shipments, and the practical subsidization of the industry resulting from the Italian Government's support of the manufacture of citrate of lime. The tariffs, therefore, do not debar Mediterranean growers from competing in United States markets on favorable terms, so far as concerns the ultimate cost of placing the orchard product before the consumer. This being a demonstrated fact, the question arises, How have the tariffs conduced to foster domestic citrus culture?

The answer, in general terms, is that they effect all that the American growers ask, namely, such a balancing of productive costs as will enable them through their superior talents for organization and better fruit to meet foreign competitors on fairly even terms in the home markets. Specifically the tariffs have minimized the importation of inferior fruit. Grades that would have been shipped on speculation to an open market, and which could have been put on the eastern seaboard at a figure less than the bare cost of production of domestic fruit, did not warrant risk in a protected market. In a word, the tariffs removed the American markets from the list of dumping grounds for the periodic surplusage of the Mediterranean crop. A market stability followed which encouraged American growers to extend their planting. Prices no longer fluctuated between absurd extremes, because the imposts acted in restraint of import gambling.

Taking up the specialization of land as the second justification for the citrus tariffs, we find that in California alone there are approximately 100,000 acres bearing groves owned by 12,000 orchardists. In years of normal weather conditions the yield will approach 40,000 carloads and is estimated to reach 75,000 carloads in the next decade. The annual freight revenues resulting to the benefit of thousands of stockholders and several hundred thousand railroad employees and dependants approximate $20,000,000. Land in citrus culture is permanently removed from competition with every other agricultural industry in this country. Without the tariffs most of this land would have been devoted to products competing with those of the Southern, Middle Western, and Eastern States. Because of the imposts which encourage citrus planting the farmer of the Middle West has received more for his grain than he otherwise would, the southern farmer more for his staples and the eastern farmer more for his. In addition, railroads and their multifarious interests have benefited by the best paying freight traffic of anything like equal volume in the world. Interstate commerce as a whole has benefited because the citrus freight revenues became of such magnitude as to promote the reduction of other freight rates. Here again the mid-western and southern producer has benefited.

Taking up the low cost to consumer as the third justification for the citrus tariffs, we find:

1. The average retail price has been as low, if not lower, than before the present tariff enactment. To properly estimate the significance of this fact it must be remembered that the retail prices of all commodities, taken as a whole, have increased in the United States during this period about 60 per cent and throughout the world about 30 per cent owing to the decreased purchasing power of gold.

2. With regard to the adequacy of the domestic citrus supply, there has resulted a year round equitable distribution to all sections never paralleled under the régime of the importers. As fruit is an essential part of a rational dietary and conducive to the general health, the importance of this perennial and even distribution merits consideration.

Recapitulating citrus tariff effects:

1. Specialization of land, removing great areas from competition with other sections.

2. Relatively cheaper fruit to consumers by about 30 per cent, and this in spite of the fact that the orchardists' labor and material expense has increased about 35 per cent.

3. A pronounced and far-reaching effect on freight rates, which has directly benefited stock, wheat, cotton, and general-produce shippers. Under the Interstate Commerce Commission railroad rates are made to bear a close relation to total traffic volume and total revenues. A reduction of citrus tariffs which would act to permanently check the expansion of an industry so productive of freight revenues as the citrus industry, must logically act to increase rates on other commodities to make up the difference.

While citrus tariffs have acted to benefit all agricultural interests and the public in general, they have not fostered monopoly. The area in the Southwest suitable for citrus culture is too vast to permit monopoly. In addition to the existent acreage of young and bearing groves, there are approximately 200,000 in California alone which are suitable for citrus culture. With conditions favoring market stability—and that implies an adequate tariff—domestic production for generations to come will be in excess of demand, with a constant tendency toward lower retail prices.

Returns: Considering the investment and constant risk, orchard returns will not average more than those of other lines of agriculture. The initial cost of putting citrus land under irrigation and preparing it for trees makes $500 per acre a reasonable valuation. In some sections cheaper land is available, but invariably there are offsets, such as distance from transportation lines, lack of handling and packing facilities, etc. A valuation of $1,000 per acre for a 6-year-old grove is a conservative total of the grower's actual investment and does not include his risk.

Growers' risk: The risk from orchard menaces are constant and arise from many causes, any one of which may effect widespread injury and loss. Sometimes a tree disease affecting bark or roots will sweep through a great territory entailing heavy loss. Again, some parisitic pest may threaten the whole industry with disaster. For instance, three years ago the discovery of a pest in one section of this State caused all the groves and all other feeding trees for the pest to be cut back to the bare trunk, entailing at least a three years' loss of crop. During the past two years the unprecedented cold has caused enormous loss. It is doubtful if citrus growers as a body have received enough during these two years to meet cultural expenses. This Duarte-Monrovia district, though small, is considered one of the very best, and has been regarded as practically immune from frosts. In the past two seasons the frost damage in this small foothill district will fall but little short of $1,000,000. Scores of growers have received no income at all from their orchards, and most other sections were much more severely injured than this. It is improbable that such extreme cold will occur again in many years. Still there is the chance that it will, and to cope with the possible emergency orchardists are installing heating apparatus at a cost of from $100 to $200 per acre.

Panama Canal: The advantage of the Panama Canal is frequently urged as compensation for a reduced tariff. That has yet to be demonstrated. It is now estimated that about 25 per cent of the California citrus crop will be shipped through the canal. Inland waterways do not complement the canal and are, in fact, in a shameful state of unpreparedness and inefficiency. About the only advantage from the canal discernable at present will be cheaper rates to the eastern seaboard for one-quarter of the California citrus yield and one-half of the crop is marketed west of Chicago.

Market security: Remove the sense of security arising from the tariff offset against cheaper production and cheaper shipment of Mediterranean fruit—which feeling of security induced citrus orchardists to expand the industry—and there will be no such increased production as will eventually restore to transcontinental carriers the freight volume diverted to the Panama Canal.

Effect of reduced citrus tariffs on freight rates: Owing to increasing expense of operation and maintenance, not a few railroad lines are hard pressed to meet fixed charges and provide for necessary betterments. The decreasing value of gold has a cumulative force with railroads. On the one hand shippers are fighting through the Interstate Commerce Commission for lower rates, and on the other labor unions demand and receive higher wages. Largely for a like reason supply companies demand and get higher prices for materials. If so large a revenue is permanently diverted from transcontinental carriers as the Panama Canal seems likely to accomplish eventually, and an inadequate citrus tariff tends to discourage such an extension of the citrus industry as looks toward a restoration of the freight volume through increased midland shipments, there must inevitably result a rise in short-haul freight rates over a vast inland section which can least afford it. The same argument is applicable to the tariffs on other Pacific coast fruits.

Disturbance of agricultural equilibrium: In earlier stages of national development it was impossible, even had there been a desire, to view agricultural resources as an entity. The result has been that whenever a new section was settled older sections have stagnated, often retrograded, until the compensation of a denser local population restored equilibrium by augmenting the home markets. The abandoned farms of New England attest this. The Middle Atlantic States are dotted with abandoned grain mills, which were driven out of business when the great western wheat lands were opened and eastern farmers could buy flour cheaper than they could produce it. Eastern stock farming became moribund when the droves of the western range found access to markets. In many sections hop farming languished and then died when the hop fields of the Pacific coast were developed. It has required decades—if it is even yet accomplished—to restore the agricultural balance. While the disturbance of conditions cited above were the unforeseen and probably unforeseeable results of bringing new areas into competition with sections originally developed from an insulated viewpoint and low horizons, practically the same effect would be produced by diverting the energies of an old settled territory into new channels. Since mortals are not prescient, these industrial readjustments are bound to occur; but it would seem that we were too intelligent a people to invite them needlessly and profitlessly. California is adapted by soil and climate to the production of fruit on an enormous scale, but the same soil and climate will produce an almost infinite variety of other crops. Horticulture requires a very heavy initial investment and the financial ability to wait years before reaping any returns. Furthermore, the California orchardist knows that in any event he must battle for his markets with the peasant fruit grower of the Mediterranean, the age of whose groves is reckoned by generations, and who has back of him his Government, the steamship companies, and the aggressive organization of importers, who, with few exceptions, are his countrymen. Take from the Californian the insurance of tariffs, which, while steadying the markets, are yet not prohibitive, and he will turn to products requiring smaller investments, involving less risk, and yielding quicker returns. Whatever else it may accomplish, it now appears almost certain that the Isthmian Canal will open the way for through steamship immigration to the Pacific coast States. The resultant greater working population will render possible the profitable cultivation of many crops now debarred by scarcity of labor. By the very nature of environing conditions the intending orchardist will, perforce, turn to southern staples, with the large probability of repeating some oft-repeated history. In this connection it is well to remember that the tariff reductions proposed affect the character of the future development of an enormous area in addition to the citrus lands.

Lemons: In the matter of lemon culture it is difficult to put into definite, coherent form the many causes which have militated against its proportionate development. A general and fairly adequate statement is that "orchardists have been learning their business for 20 years and only recently have mastered it." It has been necessary to compass through experience the whole industry from start to finish. Orchardists did not have the benefit of generations of familiarity with their undertaking. Naturally they underestimated its difficulties and were long in grasping its problems.

In tabulating my personal experience during 15 years I find:

1. A large proportion of the lemons first planted were of inferior varieties, many seedlings, etc. The fruit was rough, coarse, cured unevenly, and was of poor keeping quality. When this fact was apprehended, orchardists at once began to cut back their trees and bud them to approved varieties. Years were necessary to do this. Not all growers rebudded at the same time. It followed that grades were uneven. Splendid fruit might, in fact did, preponderate in later shipments, but during a long period there was a percentage of inferior fruit marketed.

2. In the beginning it was the usual practice for an orchardist to plant, say, four-fifths of his acreage to oranges and the balance to lemons. It proved a very unfortunate start. Oranges ripened and were shipped in bulk and returns received almost en bloc. Lemons ripened when the orchardist was busy irrigating or cultivating his major crop, and lemon picking was often irregular and hasty. Lemons required more care than oranges and returns dribbled in through a long season. The combination grower frequently came to look upon his lemons as the unremunerative source of trouble. He did not know how to prune and did not appreciate its value. He was a long time learning. He began in the belief that there was little difference between lemon and orange cultivation and was slow to see that his methods were at fault. Under the pressure of orange work, the smaller lemon orchard was slighted. Picking was done at odd times and too little attention paid to "sizing." The American grower was very careless in his handling methods and only after many costly lessons learned that a bruised lemon is a spoiled lemon. Also, that approved varieties picked at standard sizes will cure evenly to standard shipping sizes. When markets were poor he was prone to let his crop hang on the trees; when the markets improved he picked the trees bare and packed a most ridiculous assortment of sizes. Also, tree-cured lemons are inferior in acid content and in keeping quality.

3. In the methods of curing his product the American grower was as innocent of knowledge as in his cultural and field-handling methods. Old-style curing houses, built at great expense, were made dark and with little or no ventilation. He has learned differently, but he has paid the price.

4. In addition to faulty cultural, handling, and curing methods there was a further difficulty in shipping. In nine out of every ten citrus districts lemon culture was subordinate to orange culture. There were relatively few lemon groves of any considerable area. Very frequently it resulted that when lemon shipments were made there were not enough for, say, two cars, but more than enough for one. One carload would be shipped, and the balance held until another carload could be made up. Often a considerable time elapsed before sufficient fruit was received at the packing house to permit this, in which case the lemons that were prime when the first shipment was made had retrograded when the second carload was sent out. Or, as was often the case, the short load of good lemons was eked out with insufficiently cured fruit. In earlier years orange shipping, except Valencias, was finished when the lemon season was at it height, but it sometimes happened that the short car of lemons was pieced out with oranges and sent to an orange market.

Unless one has been familiar with the above-described factors, acting all through the lemon sections, it is almost impossible to measure their total effect, which was to discourage planting. The major handicap was complete ignorance of proper cultural, handling, and curing methods. In smaller districts, where the old practice of planting a portion of the orchard to lemons still obtains, it has been found expedient to so differentiate cooperative packing-house handling that one scientifically equipped house handles the output of several adjacent districts. This has been found best even where the hauling distance is considerable. Thus the La Manda Park house handles all the lemons—excepting two large groves, which ship independently—between Pasadena and Azusa. At San Dimas another modernly equipped house serves a like territory. Thus there are no longer the tag ends of shipments to hold over for the next car.

Besides the handicap of apprenticeship lemon growers have had from the first to contend with the hostility of the well-organized importers. When the McKinley bill was under consideration the country was flooded with pamphlets asserting that California lemons were deficient in acid content as compared with Mediterranean fruit. Agricultural Department chemists proved the contrary to be true, but the false claim had its effect. Opposition in many forms originating from the same source has made itself felt through the years. To-day the California lemon grower has mastered his business, and, if properly encouraged to utilize his costly experience, will give his home markets better lemons than the importers, at lower prices and in abundant supply, throughout the year.

JAMES LEONARD.

Mr. WORKS. I present a telegram, in the nature of a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of California, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SACRAMENTO, CAL., April 23, 1913.

JOHN D. WORKS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Pursuant to the provisions of a senate joint resolution adopted by both houses of the Legislature of the State of California I herewith transmit to you a copy thereof.

Senate joint resolution No. 24, relating to the preservation of the natural conditions of Lake Tahoe and of establishing by judicial decree the conflicting claims to the use of the flood waters thereof.

Whereas Lake Tahoe, on account of its great natural beauty, is regarded as a valuable asset of the State of California by the citizens thereof, and many of such citizens have acquired vested interests on the shores of such lake; and

Whereas the State claims title to the major portion of the flood waters of such lake, which waters it hopes and expects in the near future to utilize for the purpose of generating power and of irrigating lands within its border, and for the domestic uses of its citizens; and

Whereas it has become the declared intention of the Reclamation Service of the United States to convert the lake into a reservoir for an irrigation system in the State of Nevada, and to that end to artificially lower the natural rim of the lake and to widen the outlet channel of the same, thereby making it possible to draw from such lake more water than can be supplied by its average natural rise of 2½ feet per annum; and

Whereas the plans of the Reclamation Service, if carried into effect, will infringe upon the vested legal rights of the State of California and its citizens, to their irreparable damage: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate and assembly jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California does hereby protest against any interference on the part of the Federal Government or its agents with the natural conditions of Lake Tahoe; and be it further

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, respectfully requested to cause legal proceedings to be instituted in some court of competent jurisdiction in order to determine the respective rights of all persons claiming title to the flood waters of Lake Tahoe, and particularly to determine the rights of the United States of America, the State of Nevada, the State of California, and the Truckee General Electric Co.; and be it further

Resolved, That the attorney general of the State of California be, and he is hereby, respectfully requested to institute and prosecute as speedily as possible any action in the Supreme Court of the United States on behalf of the State of California and against the State of Nevada and such other claimants to the use of the waters of Lake Tahoe as may be properly joined as parties, in order to determine the respective rights of such parties to the use of such waters; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the President of the United States, to the Secretary of the Interior of the United States, to the United States Reclamation Service, and to each member of the United States Senate and House of Representatives.

Respectfully, yours,

W. N. PARRISH,
Secretary of Senate.

Mr. WORKS. I present a telegram, in the nature of a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of California, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SACRAMENTO, CAL., April 23, 1913.

Hon. JOHN D. WORKS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Pursuant to the provisions of a senate joint resolution adopted by both houses of the Legislature of the State of California, I herewith transmit to you a copy thereof.

Senate joint resolution 1, relative to the continuation by the United States of surveys for the construction of storage reservoirs for the impounding of flood waters in the Sierra Nevada Mountains in the State of California, and asking that an appropriation be made for forwarding the work as speedily as possible.

Whereas the United States Government has for several years past been securing data, through the Geological Survey and the Reclamation Service, concerning the watershed of the west slope of the Sierra Nevada Mountains and the construction of storage reservoirs for the conservation of flood waters in the winter and spring; and

Whereas the Sacramento and San Joaquin Valleys, of which these watersheds form the eastern rim, constitute a large body of the most fertile land to be found in any country, rivaling the far-famed Valley of the Nile in productiveness and capable of supporting a population of several millions when properly reclaimed and settled; and

Whereas in times of heavy snowfall and rainfall the volume of water coming down into the valleys is a continual menace to the rich lands adjacent to the Sacramento and San Joaquin Rivers, thousands of acres of which are flooded in years of heavy rainfall; and

Whereas in the report of the Reclamation Service for the year 1907 the statement is made that if storage reservoirs were constructed at the sites surveyed it would greatly simplify the drainage problems of the Sacramento and San Joaquin Rivers and the lower Sacramento Valley by reducing the flood flow in the rivers; and

Whereas the flood waters so impounded would be of the greatest value to the Sacramento and San Joaquin Valleys and the State of California by being used for irrigation instead of being allowed to flow to the ocean, often doing incalculable damage to the valleys, 800,000 acres of the lowlands of which having been flooded in 1904: Therefore be it

Resolved by the senate and the assembly jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California memorializes the Congress of the United States for the continuation of said work of surveying and constructing storage reservoirs in the watersheds of the western slope of said Sierra Nevada Mountains on the tributaries of the Feather, Yuba, and American Rivers and other tributaries of the Sacramento and San Joaquin Rivers, carrying out all measures necessary for such work and making an appropriation of sufficient size to forward it as the more speedily solved; and be it further

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to take the necessary measures for hastening the survey and construction of such reservoirs in order to impound such flood waters and enable the problem of improvement and restraint of the Sacramento and San Joaquin Rivers to be more speedily solved; and be it further

Resolved, That our Senators in Congress be instructed and our Representatives be requested to use all honorable means to secure the action desired in this matter for the purpose aforesaid; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Agriculture, the respective Houses in Congress, and to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress, including those to assume office on March 4, 1913.

Respectfully, yours,

W. N. PARRISH,
Secretary of Senate.

Mr. WORKS. I present a telegram, in the nature of a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of California, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SACRAMENTO, CAL., April 23, 1913.

Hon. JOHN D. WORKS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Pursuant to the provisions of a senate joint resolution adopted by both houses of the Legislature of the State of California, I herewith transmit to you a copy thereof.

Senate joint resolution 12, relative to action by Congress in directing an investigation through the Department of Agriculture of measures for protection of fruit from frost damage.

Whereas the great citrus belt of California has been visited by an unprecedented damaging frost involving a loss of many millions of dollars in the crop alone, as well as great damage to trees; and

Whereas great advancement has been made by both public and private experimentation in the protection of orchards all over the United States from the damaging effect of cold waves by means of heating pots and other methods of raising temperatures, the use of which has given perfect protection in some groves and has been of little benefit in others. The effect of frost damage on many fruits, particularly the citrus, is but little known and it is believed that large sums may be saved in this and other horticultural branches by a more thorough knowledge of the prevention of frost damage and the best means of determining to what extent citrus or other fruits have been rendered unfit for marketing. Large losses have been sustained which might have been prevented were more proper methods known; and

Whereas the interests of the whole country demand a thorough investigation of this question by the Department of Agriculture through the most competent experts obtainable. Such work adequately supported and ably conducted will save many millions of dollars losses to the Nation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That this being a Nation-wide problem we appeal to Congress to authorize and empower the Department of Agriculture to at once take up this question and employ the ablest and most competent men to be had for carrying on this work until a thorough knowledge shall be had of this question in its bearing on all branches of horticulture; and be it

Resolved, That upon the passage of this resolution the secretary of state be, and he is hereby, directed to forward a copy thereof to the Senators and Representatives of the State of California in Congress, and that a copy of the resolution be also transmitted to the governor of each fruit-growing State in the Union, requesting them to urge legislatures now in session to consider and take action in accordance with this resolution.

Respectfully, yours,

W. N. PARRISH,
Secretary of Senate.

Mr. WORKS. I present a telegram, in the nature of a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of California, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SACRAMENTO, CAL., April 23, 1913.

Hon. JOHN D. WORKS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Pursuant to the provisions of a senate joint resolution adopted by both houses of the Legislature of the State of California, I herewith transmit to you a copy thereof:

Senate joint resolution 25, relative to memorializing Congress regarding the citrus fruit industry of the State of California, and requesting our Senators and Representatives in Congress to use all honorable means to prevent a reduction in duties on citrus fruits below the point where the difference in the cost of production of the same would be equalized.

Whereas the citrus fruit industry is one of the great and important enterprises of this State, representing an investment of $200,000,000 and materially contributes to the upbuilding thereof; and

Whereas the rates of duty on citrus fruits should equalize the difference in cost of production between the United States and foreign countries; and

Whereas the present rates of duty bring to the Government a substantial revenue that has increased in recent years; and

Whereas a material reduction of the duties on citrus fruits would hamper and retard the growth and development of the State of California: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of California jointly, That we respectfully memorialize the Congress of the United States not to reduce the duties on citrus fruits below a point equalizing the difference in the cost of production of the same in the United States and foreign countries, and we earnestly request our Senators and Representatives in Congress to use every honorable means to prevent such reduction; be it further

Resolved, That the governor of the State of California be requested to appoint five citizens of California to present this memorial to Congress in behalf of this State; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be telegraphed to the President and to each of our Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States.

Respectfully, yours,

W. N. PARRISH,
Secretary of Senate.

Mr. WORKS. I present a telegram, in the nature of a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of California, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SACRAMENTO, CAL., April 23, 1913.

Hon. JOHN D. WORKS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Pursuant to the provisions of a senate joint resolution adopted by both houses of the Legislature of the State of California, I herewith transmit to you a copy thereof.

Senate joint resolution 26, relative to making investigations and experiments as to nature and cure of tuberculosis.

Whereas it appears that the loss of life and the suffering occasioned by the ravages of tuberculosis in its various forms in the United States are of such magnitude as to make the discovery of adequate means of eradicating that disease a matter of national concern; and

Whereas the greatest facilities, opportunities, and inducements should be afforded capable investigators with a view to discovering some practicable means for its control and cure: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of California and the Assembly jointly, That we respectfully urge on the Congress of the United States the immediate enactment of such laws and an appropriation from the Treasury of the United States of such sums as may seem advisable to Congress to afford to properly trained experts adequate means and opportunities to make the most exhaustive investigations and experiments as to the nature and cure of tuberculosis and as to alleged cures therefor, and that we further urge upon the Congress of the United States an appropriation of an adequate sum to be given as a reward to the discoverer or discoverers of effective means of curing tuberculosis on satisfactory proof of the effectiveness of such discovery and on a full and complete revelation of the effective means thus employed, so that the fullest publicity may be given thereto for the general benefit of the medical profession; be it further

Resolved, That each Senator and each Representative in Congress from the State of California be, and he is hereby, requested to use all honorable means to secure the enactment of such legislation; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forthwith transmitted by the chief clerk of the senate to the President of the Senate of the United States and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States and a copy hereof to each Member of Congress from the State of California.

Respectfully, yours,

W. N. PARRISH,
Secretary of Senate.

Mr. WORKS presented a petition of sundry inmates of the Soldiers' Home at Santa Monica, Cal., praying for the enactment of legislation transferring the Pacific Branch of the Soldiers' Home to the War Department, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Los Angeles, Cal., remonstrating against the submission to arbitration of the question of exempting American coastwise shipping passing through the Panama Canal from the payment of tolls, which was referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. I have received memorials from Henry S. Burrage, late chaplain Western Branch, National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, of Cambridge, Mass.; from Joseph S. Smith, manager, National Soldiers' Home of Bangor, Me.; from Maj. William Warner, manager, National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, of Washington, D. C.; from the Board of Managers of the National Soldiers' Home; and from Col. Edwin P. Hammond, manager, National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, of La Fayette, Ind., remonstrating against reducing the number of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers to five. I move that the memorials be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I present a joint memorial of the Legislature of Arizona, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on the Library.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on the Library and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House joint memorial 1.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the First Legislature of Arizona, in special session convened, respectfully represent:

That the title and possession of Monticello, the home place of Thomas Jefferson, is vested in Mr. LEVY, a private citizen of the State of New York, and the place is now practically in a state of ruin and decay;

That the title to the grave of Jefferson, wherein lie the remains of the author of the Declaration of American Independence and those of his beloved wife, and which grave is embraced within a space about 100 feet square of the grounds of Monticello, is vested in the descendants of Jefferson;

That access to the grave of Jefferson is open to his descendants but not to the general public, except upon the payment of a fee to Mr. LEVY, thus commercializing one of the most sacred spots in America; but no admission to the house of this great apostle of humanity is allowed to any person;

Now, therefore, it is peculiarly appropriate that this place should not be in private ownership, and it is peculiarly appropriate that Monticello, the home in life as it is the home in death of this great American, should be the common heritage of the people of this country.

It is especially fitting now for the people of the United States to obtain this hallowed place that they may keep and beautify and adorn it as a shrine to which every lover of liberty may go at will to pay his tribute of respect: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the Legislature of the State of Arizona, That the Congress of the United States be, and it is hereby, urged to enact such legislation as may be necessary to vest in the United States the title and possession to the home and grave of Thomas Jefferson; and

Resolved further, That a copy of this memorial and these resolutions be forwarded to the President of the United States, the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to the Representatives of Arizona in Congress; and that our Representatives in Congress be, and they are hereby, requested to do all in their power to accomplish the enactment of such legislation.

MARCH 22, 1913.

Read the third time in full and passed by the following vote: 29 ayes, 3 nays, 1 absent, 2 excused.

H. H. LINNEY,
Speaker of the House.

Passed the senate April 7, 1913, by a vote of 17 ayes, 2 excused.

M. G. CUNNIFF,
President of the Senate.

Mr. HOLLIS presented petitions of sundry citizens of Hanover, Exeter, Concord, and Manchester, all in the State of New Hampshire, praying for the submission to arbitration of the question exempting American coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls through the Panama Canal, which were referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey presented a petition of the Pennsylvania Millers' State Association, praying that if a duty be placed on grain an equalizing duty be placed on the products of grain, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PERKINS. I present a telegram, in the nature of a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of California, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SACRAMENTO, CAL., April 22, 1913.

Hon. GEORGE C. PERKINS,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.:

I have the honor to hand you herewith copy of assembly joint resolution No. 18, adopted by senate and assembly and approved by the governor:

APRIL 18, 1913.

To the Governor:

Assembly joint resolution 18, relative to the protection of the California beet-sugar industry in the enactment by Congress of laws affecting tariffs on imports into the United States.

Whereas in the process of tariff revision by Congress the indicated tendency is toward an abolition of all duties on imported sugar; and

Whereas such a policy would be calamitous to the cane and beet-sugar industry of the Nation at large, and especially to the beet-sugar business of the State of California, which produces 165,000 tons per annum, or one-quarter of the beet-sugar output of the United States; and

Whereas the annual consumption of sugar in our country is now 3,500,000 tons per annum, supplied, viz, from domestic cane grown in Porto Rico, Louisiana, and Sandwich Islands, 1,100,000 tons; from beet sugar manufactured in 16 States, 650,000 tons; 1,750,000 tons, the balance, being purchased from foreign countries and refined by a few corporations on the Atlantic seaboard, who are clamoring for "free sugar" in order that they may check the further invasion of their markets by the constantly growing beet-sugar industry; and

Whereas our Nation's beet-sugar output has increased from 40,000 tons in 1897 to 650,000 tons in 1912—a rate of increase greater than can be shown in any country in Europe during an equal period of time—while our cane-producing districts have apparently reached the limit of their productivity; and

Whereas this country should, and can, become self-supplying in the matter of sugar through the development of the beet-sugar industry, now involving the use of only 450,000 acres of land against 274,000,000 acres adapted to the cultivation of the sugar beet; and

Whereas the development of the industry is checked by the menace of a free-sugar bill, which will subject this product to competition with cane and beet sugar produced under the low-wage conditions in the Tropics and Europe, and at prices delivered at our seaboards lower than, under our conditions, is paid to the farmers of our State for the sugar in the beet before it is manufactured: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Legislature of the State of California (a majority of all members elected to senate and assembly voting for the adoption of this resolution and concurring therein) requests the Senate and House of Representatives of Congress at Washington and the President of the United States that due regard be had, in the consideration of tariff revision, for the claims of the beet-sugar industry, which is so full of promise to our Nation, and that the principle governing the revision of the tariff in this regard be that the tariff should equalize the difference between the cost of production of sugar at home and abroad.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to each of the Members of Congress from the State of California, to be presented to the President and Congress.

L. B. MALLORY,
Chief Clerk of Assembly.

Mr. PERKINS presented a telegram, in the nature of a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of California, remonstrating against an undue reduction of the duty on citrus fruits, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a telegram, in the nature of a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of California, praying that an appropriation be made for the study of tuberculosis and the alleged cures thereof, which was referred to the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine.

He also presented a telegram, in the nature of a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of California, praying that an investigation be made to prevent damage to crops by frost, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a telegram, in the nature of a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of California, remonstrating against any interference by the Government with the natural conditions of Lake Tahoe, Cal., which was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

He also presented a telegram, in the nature of a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of California, praying for the construction of storage reservoirs to impound the flood waters of the Sacramento and San Joaquin Rivers, in that State, which was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

Mr. GALLINGER presented a petition of sundry citizens of Concord, N. H., and a petition of sundry citizens of Nashua, N. H., praying for the repeal of the clause in the Panama Canal act exempting American coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls, which were referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

Mr. BURTON presented a resolution of members of the Woman's Franchise League of Bellefontaine, Ohio, favoring the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution granting the right of suffrage to women, which was referred to the Committee on Woman Suffrage.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland presented a petition of members of the Park View Citizens' Association of the District of Columbia, praying for the enactment of legislation limiting the issuing of permits for the erection within the fire limits of dwellings of less than 16 feet frontage, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. LODGE presented petitions of W. H. Whiting and 117 other citizens of Barre, Charlton, Leicester, New Salem, Petersham, Princeton, and Spencer; of Norman S. Waite and 20 other citizens of Allston; of Charles H. Stearns and 38 other citizens of Brookline; of Frederick W. Mowatt and 20 other citizens of Lynn; of William C. Buck and 60 other citizens of Reading; of 51 citizens of East Douglas, Grafton, and North Uxbridge; and of the congregation of the Universalist Church of Beverly, all in the State of Massachusetts, praying for the repeal of the clause in the Panama Canal act exempting American coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls, which were referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

Mr. McLEAN presented the memorial of James T. Fitton, of Rockville, Conn., remonstrating against the adoption of the proposed income-tax amendment to the pending tariff bill, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. KENYON presented petitions of sundry citizens of Blackhawk and Ringgold Counties, in the State of Iowa, praying for an adjustment of the pay of railway mail clerks on account of the conditions brought about by the parcel-post law, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. PAGE presented a petition of Local Union No. 43, Pulp, Sulphite, and Paper Mill Workers, of Bellows Falls, Vt., remonstrating against the passage of the pending tariff bill, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GALLINGER. I present a telegram relating to a feature of the proposed tariff law, which I ask may be read and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the telegram was read and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

NEW YORK, N. Y., April 23, 1913.

Hon. JACOB H. GALLINGER,
Washington, D. C.:

Representatives of workmen affiliated with lithographic labor organizations, consisting of pressmen, transferers, engravers, artists, press feeders, stone grainers, and paper cutters, request a hearing before your committee on the proposed Underwood tariff bill. Trade much disturbed. Our representatives are opposed to radical reduction in the tariff incorporated in the Underwood bill. We represent 50,000 workmen.

W. E. COAKLEY,
Representative, 200 East Twenty-third Street, New York, N. Y.

JACOB M. COOPER.

Mr. KENYON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 754) for the relief of Jacob M. Cooper, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 12) thereon.

AGRICULTURAL CREDIT AND LIVE-STOCK INSURANCE.

Mr. FLETCHER, from the Committee on Printing, to which was referred Senate resolution 52, submitted by himself on the 17th instant, reported it without amendment, submitted a report (No. 14) thereon, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the report to the British Board of Agriculture and Fisheries of an inquiry into agricultural credit and agricultural cooperation in Germany, with some notes on German live-stock insurance, by J. R. Cahill, which was presented to both Houses of Parliament of Great Britain, be printed as a Senate document, together with the accompanying illustrations and letter.

SOIL SURVEY OF ESCAMBIA COUNTY, FLA.

Mr. FLETCHER, from the Committee on Printing, to which was referred Senate resolution 46, submitted by Mr. BRYAN on the 15th instant, reported it without amendment, submitted a report (No. 15) thereon, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That there shall be reprinted 1,000 additional copies of the Soil Survey of Escambia County, Fla., for the use of the Senate document room.

CONTROL OF MONEY AND CREDIT.

Mr. FLETCHER. From the Committee on Printing, to which was referred Senate resolution No. 16, providing for the printing of 10,000 copies of the report of the Money Trust investigation, I report back a concurrent resolution, and I submit a report (No. 16) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution. There is quite a demand for this report.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 1) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 6,000 additional copies of House Report No. 1593, Sixty-second Congress, on the "Concentration of control of money and credit," of which 2,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate document room and 4,000 copies for the use of the House document room.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. OVERMAN. I report from the Committee on Rules an amendment to Rule XII and ask that it be read, printed, and go over one day (S. Res. 64).

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina, from the Committee on Rules, submits a report, which he asks be read. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That Rule XII be amended as follows:

"3. Immediately after and before the result of each roll call is ascertained and announced the Clerk shall call the names of the absentees."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie over one day under the rule.

REPORT OF PARK COMMISSION (S. DOC. NO. 16).

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, on the 15th instant I submitted a document, being an abridgment of the Park Commission report of the District of Columbia, which, on my motion, was referred to the Committee on Printing for consideration. I am directed by that committee to report a resolution which I send to the desk, and for which I ask present consideration. I also submit a report (No. 17) thereon. The document to be printed accompanies the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire reports from the Committee on Printing a resolution and asks unanimous consent for its present consideration. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 63), as follows:

Resolved, That an abridgment of the report of the Park Commission and of the report of the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia, submitted to the Senate on January 15, 1902, be printed as a Senate document, with accompanying illustrations, and that 3,350 additional copies be printed for the use of the Senate document room.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Reserving the right to object, I ask what is the document referred to in the resolution?

Mr. GALLINGER. It is the report of the Park Commission. Very likely the Senator from Mississippi is familiar with it. It deals with the development of the city of Washington, so far as our parks are concerned. It is quite a large volume. It has been printed several times. It has been thought desirable, inasmuch as there are many calls from all over the country for the document, that we should print an abridged edition. To print the number named in the resolution will only cost $500.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have no objection.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

CLAIMS AGAINST MEXICO.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred Senate resolution 62, submitted by himself on the 21st instant, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 13) thereon, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the President is respectfully requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to cause to be transmitted to the Senate—

First. A full list of the names of claimants, if any, and the nature and amount of the claims for damages to person or property made by citizens of the United States of America against the Republic of Mexico and filed or deposited with the Department of State at Washington, D. C., since the beginning of the Madero revolution in Mexico to the present time, together with the statement of fact on which said claims are based.

Second. A full list of the names of all citizens of these United States, if any, who while leading lawful and peaceful lives in Mexico have been killed or wounded in Mexico or driven out of Mexico by Mexican soldiers or other armed bands on Mexican soil, together with the facts and circumstances attending such killing, wounding, or forceful deportation.

Third. A full list, if any, of such peaceful citizens of the United States of America as have been forcibly seized and held prisoners for ransom in the Republic of Mexico during the time first mentioned, and what sums of money, if any, have been paid by any person or persons to secure the release of anyone so imprisoned or held.

Fourth. What redress, if any, has been offered by Mexico in the premises, or demanded by the United States of America, and the result of such offer or demand, and what assurance of protection to the lives and property of our peaceful, law-abiding citizens in Mexico does that Republic offer.

COL. RICHARD H. WILSON.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN], the chairman of the Committee on Claims, is not present, but I see the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], who is second on that committee, in his seat, and I think what I intend to propose will be agreeable to him. The bill (S. 662) for the relief of Col. Richard H. Wilson, Fourteenth Infantry, United States Army, when introduced, was referred, inadvertently, I believe, to the Committee on Claims. It does not appropriately belong to that committee, and I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. OVERMAN. The bill properly belongs to the Committee on Military Affairs and not to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. The bill was referred during the last session of Congress to the Committee on Military Affairs, and I think it is proper that it should go there now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Committee on Claims will be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, on the 17th of March Senate resolution No. 13, relative to the employees of the Committee on Banking and Currency, was considered, amended, and agreed to. The chairman of that committee was not then present, and I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the resolution was agreed to be reconsidered.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the resolution?

Mr. OWEN. It relates to the employees of the Committee on Banking and Currency, and was reported from the committee of which, I believe, the Senator from Mississippi is chairman.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask, then, that the matter go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. OWEN. It has heretofore been reported by that committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But there was an amendment to the resolution made on the floor.

Mr. OWEN. I desire it to be reconsidered. I agree, however, that it should go to the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is no objection, the vote by which the resolution was agreed to will be reconsidered, and it will be recommitted to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

AMENDMENT TO HOMESTEAD LAW.

Mr. BORAH. On April 9 I introduced a bill (S. 598) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend sections 2291 and 2297 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to homesteads," which I asked to lie on the table. I move that the bill be taken from the table and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED.

Bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. MYERS:

A bill (S. 1348) to allow additional entries under the enlarged homestead act; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. THOMPSON:

A bill (S. 1349) admitting to citizenship and fully naturalizing George Edward Lerrigo, of the city of Topeka, in the State of Kansas; to the Committee on Immigration.

By Mr. PITTMAN:

A bill (S. 1350) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to designate certain tracts of land in the State of Nevada upon which continuous residence shall not be required under the homestead laws; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 1351) for the relief of Mollie Richardson, heir of Stanford Mims, deceased; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. JONES:

(By request.) A bill (S. 1352) to extend the time for the completion of the Alaska-Northern Railway, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Territories.

A bill (S. 1353) to authorize the board of county commissioners of Okanogan County, Wash., to construct and maintain a bridge across the Okanogan River at or near the town of Malott; to the Committee on Commerce.

A bill (S. 1354) relating to the election of United States Senators; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (S. 1355) relating to easements in connection with reclamation projects; to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

By Mr. BURTON:

A bill (S. 1356) to amend section 4 of an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters,' approved June 21, 1906," approved June 23, 1910, and to repeal said original section; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. CUMMINS:

A bill (S. 1357) granting a pension to Halle W. Dale; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BRISTOW:

A bill (S. 1358) granting an increase of pension to Jefferson Hurst; to the Committee on Pensions.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR SERVICE.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Mr. President, I wish to present a resolution and then I wish to ask unanimous consent for its present consideration. In this connection I desire to say that I have certain information in regard to the men employed in the Diplomatic and Consular Service which is very astounding to me.

In the Diplomatic Service of the United States there are 10 ambassadors—2 from the District of Columbia, 2 from New York, and 1 each from Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, Missouri, and Washington—the salary of each being $17,500.

In the same service there are two classes of envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary, one class receiving a salary of $12,000, and the other $10,000.

Of the first class of ministers there are 8—2 each from New York, Maryland, and Illinois, and 1 each from Vermont and Pennsylvania.

Of the second class there are 27—5 from New York, 4 each from New Jersey and Illinois, 3 from the District of Columbia, 2 each from Pennsylvania and Minnesota, and 1 each from Delaware, Indiana, Massachusetts, Kentucky, Missouri, Kansas, and West Virginia.

Thus it will be seen that of the 35 ambassadors and ministers there are none from the South, counting Kentucky as a border State, while the District of Columbia has five.

The Consular Service is divided into classes, with consuls general ranking highest.

The consuls general of Class I, with a salary of $12,000, are but two in number, located at London and Paris, respectively, one being from Indiana and the other from Ohio.

Of Class II, with a salary of $8,000, there are 7 in all—2 from the District of Columbia, 2 from Ohio, and 1 each from Pennsylvania, Illinois, and Wisconsin.

Of Class III, with a salary of $6,000, there are 9 in all—1 each from Indiana, Illinois, Vermont, Missouri, South Dakota, and Washington, with 3 vacancies.

Of Class IV, with a salary of $5,500, there are 12 in all—2 from Ohio, 2 from Louisiana, 2 from West Virginia, and 1 each from the District of Columbia, New York, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, North Dakota, Wisconsin, and West Virginia.

Of Class V, with a salary of $4,500, there are 17 in all—3 each from the District of Columbia and New York, 2 from Massachusetts, and 1 each from Indiana, Virginia, Wisconsin, New Jersey, California, Tennessee, and Oregon, with 1 vacancy.

Of Class VI, with a salary of $3,500, there are 9 in all—2 from Illinois, and 1 each from Oklahoma, Iowa, and Missouri, with 4 vacancies.

Of Class VII, with a salary of $3,000, there are 3 in all—1 each from New York, Colorado, and Illinois.

Of consuls general at large, with a salary of $5,000, there are 5 in all—1 each from New York, Maine, Kansas, and North Carolina, with 1 vacancy.

Out of the 64 consuls general, only 5, or 7 per cent, are from Southern States, while the District of Columbia alone is favored with 6. The aggregate salary of the 5 from the Southern States is $25,000, while the 6 from the District of Columbia have an aggregate salary of $45,000.

Under the consuls general there are 241 consuls, divided into 9 classes, with salaries ranging from $8,000 down to $2,000. Of those who receive over $2,000, 23 only are from Southern States, while the District of Columbia has 13, more than half of the least-paid consuls being from Southern States.

The salaries in the aggregate of consuls general and of consuls from all the Southern States amount to $84,000, while the aggregate salaries of those from Ohio alone amount to $103,500; those from the District of Columbia alone to $72,500; New York, $64,500; Illinois, $62,000; Pennsylvania, $57,000.

Posts in the Consular Service held by Democrats, especially southern Democrats, pitifully few in number, notwithstanding the insistent professions of recent Republican administrations of the nonpartisan character of the method employed in the selection of applicants for admission, subjecting them to a fair examination without regard to party affiliation or State of residence, are comparatively insignificant and inconsequential, and most certainly out of keeping with the importance of the communities and Commonwealths from which they come. An investigation of the consular list, with the salary class, will show this. An investigation of the department's method of examination in recent years will show that of 282 persons in the Consular Service, taking no account of vacancies, only 80, or 28 per cent, have ever taken any other than a political or favored examination; while by a special kind of examination brought into vogue by the Roosevelt administration and practiced under the Taft administration, the test has been so severely rigid as fully to warrant the suspicion that it was conceived and constructed to protect the favorites of those two administrations. An impartial and common-sense scrutiny of the practices of the Republican administrations and of the State Department must be convincing not only to that effect, but persuasive that the intent was also to hamper and discourage worthy and highly competent southern Democrats from aspiring to positions in the foreign service.

In short, over 200 of the persons now in the Consular Service have never taken any kind of examination to test their real fitness for their posts; and 95 per cent of that number are Republicans from Northern States, or from the District of Columbia, where residence in the social center in the vicinity of the White House has given them, through Republican Presidents, an open sesame to the best in the foreign service of the Government, from ambassadors to the cream of the Consular Service.

Mr. President, I wish now to call attention to the appointments from the States.

From Alabama there are only three consuls, the aggregate of the salaries of the three being $6,500. There are none in the Diplomatic Service.

From Florida there is only one, with a salary of $2,000.

From Mississippi there are four, with aggregate salaries of $7,400.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the one from Florida is in the Consular Service, is he not?

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Yes; in the Consular Service.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is no one at all from Florida in the Diplomatic Service.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I am including both the Consular and the Diplomatic Service in the statement I am now making.

From the District of Columbia there are 65, with salaries amounting to $205,350.

From Illinois there are 38, with salaries aggregating $157,300.

From New York there are 79, with salaries of $278,700.

From Ohio there are 39, with salaries of $142,000.

From Pennsylvania there are 60, with salaries of $194,100.

Taking this list by sections, Mr. President, from the Northeastern States there are 156, with salaries of $550,000; from the border States 52, with salaries of $182,225; from the Middle Western States 145, with salaries of $498,650; from other Western States 75, with salaries of $218,475; from the District of Columbia 65, with salaries of $205,350; from the 11 Southern States, with a population of over 23,000,000 people, there are only 80, with salaries amounting to $167,300, less than several of the States I have mentioned.

It must be remembered, Mr. President, that these consuls are supposed to represent not so much the diplomatic interests of the country but its business and trade. In my section of the country there is an immense development in manufactures and an immense sale of the products of our soil—perhaps the largest of any part of the United States when you take cotton and its products—yet there are only 80 consuls to serve us and not a single ambassador.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator that he gives a little too much credit to these consuls when he says their duties are not so much diplomatic. They are not at all diplomatic.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. That is true; they are not at all diplomatic; they are purely of a business nature. That being the fact, I do not see why such an immense number should be appointed from the District of Columbia, which has no manufacturing or export interests whatever.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me an inquiry?

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator if it is not true that so far as ambassadors and ministers are concerned as a rule they have tendered their resignations to the President?

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I am talking about the present situation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; but will it not be remedied by the Senator's President when he reaches that point?

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I hope it will be remedied, but it seems to be going along very slowly. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I ask leave to print in the RECORD the table I have prepared, so that Senators may see exactly what the situation is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, leave will be granted.

The table is as follows:

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution may be adopted.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. Has the Senator's investigation gone to the extent of enabling him to state what is the political faith of these consular officers?

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. My information has been that they are almost wholly Republicans.

Mr. THOMAS. Since or before the election?

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Both before and since. There have been very few changes. I ask that the resolution be read, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution, which will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 65), as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations is hereby directed to inquire into and report to the Senate the number of men in the Diplomatic Service of the United Staes and in the Consular Service, the States from which appointed, and the aggregate salaries of the appointees from the several States and the District of Columbia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, before the resolution is adopted I should like to ask its author a question. The Consular Service is entered, I understand, through competitive examinations. I should like to know whether it is the desire of the Senator from Alabama to abolish the custom or rule of the department with regard to the Consular Service, and open it up to purely political appointments?

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. In reply, Mr. President, I will say that I stated that over 200 of these consuls have never submitted to any examination whatever. They are in the service without an examination. I am not opposed to an examination to show the fitness of the men, but I am heartily in favor of every section of the United States having a fair and equal proportion of the officers who are appointed.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, so am I. I understand that there are a certain number—I have no doubt the Senator from Alabama has given the number correctly—who were in the service at the time the rule was promulgated by the State Department. I have suggested what I have solely to avoid any interpretation by my silence that I favor the abolition of the rule of merit which has been established and which I understand is now being enforced in the State Department. I hope that rule will continue, although in the very nature of things it ought to afford each geographical community or section of the United States a fairly equal representation in the service. That is true because men are very much alike all over the country.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Yes; and I want to say, Mr. President, that it will hardly be considered possible by anyone on this floor that out of the 23,000,000 people in the South there are only 87 who are qualified to enter the Consular Service.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think so; but it may be that the men from the South have not applied for entry to the Consular Service under this rule. I do not know whether they have or not. But if they have, and if competent men from the South have been denied appointment in order to appoint incompetent men, or less competent men, from the North, I should be the first to condemn a practice of that kind.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The two statements of the Senator from Iowa are not in accord with one another. If this has been a service based upon competitive examination, then of course the question who has applied is irrelevant. It seems that by some queer coincidence of politics with civil-service merit seven-eighths of the employees in the Diplomatic and Consular Service are Republicans. It seems that by some queer coincidence of politics with civil-service merit about three-fourths of the employees of the departments are Republicans.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Does the Senator speak from investigations that he has made in regard to the politics of these men?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am speaking from the facts with regard to the Diplomatic and Consular Service just presented by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I do not understand that the Senator from Alabama drew any distinction as to the politics of the men now in that service.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Wyoming is right about that; my inference was an inference; but they all come from the Northern States, and they do not come from the Southern States. They all come from the Republican geography of the country, and none of them come from the Democratic geography of the country, and I drew the inference. I would suggest that the Senator from Alabama add something else to his resolution of inquiry, to wit, to find out what is the political faith of the men holding these places.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I have no objection at all to that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I notice the Senator from Iowa spoke about competitive examinations. I have been here a pretty good long while. I have seen two men break into the Diplomatic Service from Mississippi on what are called competitive examinations. They are not competitive in any proper sense at all.

Then, as far as I am concerned, I believe that if the present administration does not change that, the confirmation of appointments ought to be resisted in this body. There is no use telling me that southerners are not just as fit for public employment in the Diplomatic and Consular Service as men north of the line. So far in the history of this country they have shown their equality in the field, in the forum, before the bench, and everywhere else, and they are equal with them.

I suggest to the Senator from Alabama that he add to the resolution a further inquiry as to the political faith of the incumbents of these offices.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I am perfectly willing to do that.

I wish to say further that I have never seen any notice of any vacancies that were about to occur and calling for men to stand an examination. I have had three men examined for the service from Alabama and only two of them were passed. I think if there had been notice when there was going to be a vacancy in the Consular Service there would have been a great many applications from Alabama or Mississippi or Florida of highly qualified men, graduates of universities, familiar with the manufacturing and industrial interests of the whole country.

Mr. WILLIAMS. At the suggestion of the Senator from Oregon, I want to add to my suggestion, in order to avoid complications, in view of the character of men who can change their politics quicker than any administration, that the inquiry be directed to their political faith at the time of their appointment.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. There have been no appointments since the present administration came in that I know of, except two or three. I am perfectly willing to have the amendment suggested by the Senator from Mississippi added to the resolution.

Mr. WARREN. May I interrupt the Senator for a moment?

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I think I can speak rather freely on the subject, because the State I have the honor of representing in part has no representation whatever in either the Diplomatic or the Consular Service, aside from one secretary of legation.

Regarding the examination, my understanding has been that the departments have not called for examinations for specific places, but they have called for examinations of classes, and when those who apply have passed they are graded, and the places that may be open are filled by selection and acceptance from that class. In fact, there is a waiting list most of the time of those who have satisfactorily passed the prescribed examination.

I presume the Senator may be differentiating between those appointed under the old system and those appointed since the period of examinations began.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. No; I am speaking of the present system.

Mr. WARREN. I hope the resolution will be antedated to cover the previous time, so that we may know what percentage have gone into the service through the examinations and acceptance on their merits, supposed to be regardless of their political faith.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming if it is not true that some kind of a certificate is required from a Senator or official in order that the applicant may stand this examination.

Mr. WARREN. I think he has to give references as to his character and standing.

Mr. BACON. The rule is that he shall present a request from the Senator or Representative that he be allowed to stand an examination.

Mr. WARREN. Still he can present it without the indorsement of a Senator or Representative.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It requires the recommendation of a Senator to get the examination. That, I am sure, has been the rule. The result was, as the Senate was largely Republican, that those requests came from the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. What I complain about is that Senators did not know when vacancies were going to occur and never heard of them so as to be able to advise their constituents. It is only when they make special requests that the privilege is granted. In the instance in my State, three or four men were examined, and I succeeded in getting two appointed. They passed the examination at a very high grade.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the junior Senator from Georgia whether if at any time a Democratic Senator indorsed anyone for an examination that indorsement did not go just as far with the department as though it had been an indorsement by a Republican?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have not the detailed information to be able to answer.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Alabama has just testified to the fact that, as far as he was concerned, it had.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. No; I said I had recommended some four gentlemen from Alabama for examination and only two who were permitted to take the examination passed.

Mr. SMOOT. Utah has not any representation in the Diplomatic Service. I find that, as far as the West is concerned, representation in both services is not very much greater than in the South; but there is a cause for that, Mr. President. The expense of coming here, where the examination takes place, from the Pacific coast is very great indeed. A great many people can not afford to incur the expense to come here and take the examination when they are not positive of an appointment after the examination is taken. I really believe that that is a part of the reason. Of course——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am satisfied that is not true as to my own State, because the distance is not very great.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not speaking of the South.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The people in our section are very fond of coming to Washington.

Mr. SMOOT. Particularly at the present time.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not think the criticism that is best founded is that which relates to the matter of the requirement of an examination. That is of recent origin, and the representation in the Consular Service as a result of that examination is a very small percentage of the consuls representing the United States in foreign countries. I doubt if there is one in fifty now serving who got there through that examination. Consequently that question does not materially affect the situation, so grossly unjust, which has been disclosed by the paper read by the Senator from Alabama. That situation has been caused by appointments under an altogether different system. That situation, with its gross inequality in representation among the consuls of the different sections of the country, has been caused by appointments outside of any examination, and that is an evil. The question is, How is it to be remedied? Everyone will recognize that it is an evil; everyone will recognize that it is a condition that should not exist, and which should not be allowed to continue to exist if there is any way to reach it.

So far as that particular order is concerned, I do not think there is anything in it that is to be very much criticized. I have had occasion myself to look upon it with favor. I think that possibly it is not an order which should be universal in its application and enforcement. I think it is very frequently the case that a man who could not stand the examination which is required by that order would make a first-class consul. I think it is very frequently the case that some man could be found who would make a better consul than any man who stood the examination. The best consular representative is not always the man who can stand the examination in foreign branches, because that is a very severe examination. I have had occasion to look at it, and it is one that, I am frank to say, I could not pass successfully; and I do not believe that any Senator here, unless he went back to school for a month or two and reviewed his studies, could pass it.

There are many young men who can pass that examination who have no peculiar qualifications for the Consular Service. On the other hand, there are a great many men, men of affairs, men of business experience, men of energy, men of initiative, who would make very excellent consuls—the best of consuls—who could not possibly pass the examination.

Therefore I think a better system would be one which, while adhering to the order of examinations as a general thing, would admit the propriety of making exceptions whenever it appeared it was to the interest of the public service that some man should be appointed to the Consular Service who did not possess the necessary familiarity with the higher branches of mathematics and other branches of knowledge which are required by that examination.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. LODGE. I did not know that the applicants were examined in mathematics. I think of much more importance is the requirement that they should know one language besides their own. I think that must keep a great many very valuable men out of the service.

Mr. BACON. It does keep a great many out. I have had occasion to correspond at various times with the Department of State about that fact. In this country the knowledge of foreign languages is not general. It is extremely difficult for a man to know practically a foreign language who lives in America, because he hears but one language. A man may make himself quite proficient in a language while a student in college, but if he does not keep it up by mingling with those who speak that language in a few years he practically loses it. There is no question about that whatsoever.

Therefore, as suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts, that does debar a very large number of men who would make efficient consuls. While a knowledge of the language of the country in which the consul is to perform his duties is very important it is not essential. I think the rule ought to be relaxed.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator allow me to state a case right there that happened within my own knowledge?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. OVERMAN. A clerk in a department here who knew nothing about business except to do clerical work came to me and said he would like to get into the Consular Service. I asked him if he could speak a foreign language. He said, "No; but I am going to a night school here in Washington, and I think I can learn it." He went to the night school, learned the foreign language, and succeeded in passing the examination and was appointed. He knew nothing about the business matters of the country; he was purely a clerk; and yet he passed the examination. It is a rule that I think ought to be relaxed in some way.

Mr. BACON. I think the spirit which prompted that order, which was passed in the administration of Mr. Roosevelt, is to be applauded. It in a measure took the Consular Service out of politics. It did not altogether do so, because those who had to administer the law naturally were influenced in some degree by those who were in political affiliation with them, and there is a discretion even after the examination has been passed as to who shall be selected. So it did not entirely eliminate politics, but it did very largely do so. I think the purpose and spirit of the order are to be applauded.

Now, I do not think that in the administration of that order there has been any marked injustice. I think the Senator from Alabama does injustice to the department in the particular in which he mentions, to wit, that parties were not upon notice as to a vacancy and that therefore they had not an opportunity to make application for examination to fill that vacancy.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I said, if the Senator from Georgia will permit me, I did not know why it was, but we had no notice of the fact that there were any vacancies in the places of consuls, and therefore we had no opportunity of knowing, unless we went to the department and found out privately, whether there was to be a change in the future. Then there would be only one or two men appointed, so that there could not be any general system by which they could qualify themselves under the rules of the department.

Mr. BACON. I am in entire sympathy with the general purpose of the Senator from Alabama that there should be a change in this matter, and I am trying to show that the particular feature to which attention has been directed is not that of which there can be such criticism as, if sustained, will correct the evil. What I was about to say when the Senator interrupted me is that under this order no one is examined for any particular position. He is not examined, when it is found out that there is a vacancy in Bombay, for an appointment to Bombay. There is a general examination for the purpose of securing the names of those who will be deemed eligible by the President as proper men to appoint whenever there is a vacancy, just like there is, for instance, in the civil service. It is true that in the civil service there is some classification; the men stand an examination for clerks in some subdivision or something of that kind. But in this order there is a general standing program under which the President designates men for examination upon the recommendation of Senators and, I think, also of Representatives; I am not sure about that, I think so, however. In other words, he gives permission to them to stand an examination in order that by and under the evidence furnished by those examinations he may be in a position to judge whether the applicant is a man proper to be appointed or not. The names of the men who have passed the examination are put upon the list. They do not have to wait for a vacancy until the examination is ordered. Their names are put upon the list and then when vacancies occur men are selected from those lists and appointed to fill the places.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me a minute, I repeat it is of course perfectly natural when there are 100 men on a list and a dozen of them to be appointed that the element of personal influence should have some controlling effect. I have no doubt that it does. The order has in a great measure eliminated from the Consular Service the political feature, but, as I said, that does not reach the present evil.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Before my colleague passes from that will he let me ask him a question? Is it not the entire difference between the examinations for the Consular Service and the ordinary civil-service examinations that under the ordinary civil-service examination each State receives its due quota and three who stood the best examination are selected to the service, while under this examination quite a long list is made and the selection is made which pleases the appointing power best?

Mr. BACON. There is undoubtedly more opportunity for that to be done.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I wish to ask the Senator in this connection whether when such an examination is ordered the Secretary of State should not take the applicants from States that have not their pro rata of appointments?

Mr. BACON. The Senator anticipates me in that. I am trying to get to that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We were so anxious to hear the Senator on it that we wanted it before he got to it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me to make the suggestion, I think there is one thing passed over in his very natural desire to improve the Consular Service by getting the valuable men who can not pass the examination. There is one great obstacle now in the present regulations. As Senators are well aware, all the consulates are graded. They are graded according to salaries. There are seven grades. Under the present regulations new appointments are made only to the two lowest grades. That is a thing which I think will, unless changed, interfere very seriously with getting the valuable men who can not pass the examination.

Mr. BACON. The Senator is entirely correct. The only mistake he made was in saying that I had passed it over. I had not got to it. I have been struggling for some time trying to reach it.

Mr. LODGE. I have no doubt that by the time the Senator gets through——

Mr. BACON. It will all be covered.

Mr. LODGE. He will have gotten every one of what he calls these valuable men, who can not pass the examination, out of the service.

Mr. BACON. That is not the purpose which I have in view. It is really difficult for me to continue the thread of what I am saying, not only because of the interruption but because of the different views presented by the different Senators who have made the interruption.

I was about to say that I am sorry the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] is not here, because I think he is really the author of that order. I had correspondence with him at the time he was Secretary of State and I have had conversation with him since then. I think the purpose was a laudable one.

I want to say as to the matter which was suggested by my colleague, and about which I intended to speak, that while there is no such hard and fast rule as is attempted to be laid down in the civil-service law with reference to the distribution of these officers among the States, I know that there has been expressed, and I believe honestly expressed, a desire through this examination in a measure to distribute these consular appointments in the different States.

But the difficulty is, as I said in the outset, that this affects a mere small fractional percentage of those who are in the Consular Service, and it would take half a century—certainly a quarter of a century—with the most rigid adherence to the purpose, to distribute them to the different States through this method of examination and to correct the evil as it now stands. The question is, What is to be done now? Ought it to remain as it is? Ought it to remain with one section of the country almost exclusively filling up the Consular Service, or ought it to be distributed?

I am very frank to say that while I believe that as a general rule there ought to be some relaxation of this order, and men who do not pass the examination ought to be appointed, I think in the present condition of affairs it ought to be very severely relaxed; and I believe it is the duty, not simply of a Democratic administration, but that it would be the duty of a Republican administration if it were in power, to so change the present Consular Service as in some degree, at least, to make a due proportion of representation in this service for one part of the country as well as for the other.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not desire to interrupt the discussion, but I rise for the purpose of saying that when I get an opportunity to do so I shall ask that the resolution go over under the rule. I want to look into it a little more carefully.

Mr. BACON. Then, Mr. President, I have no desire to occupy the floor further.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. I object to the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. WORKS. Since we are still under the order of business of bills and joint resolutions, I want to offer——

Mr. THOMAS. I was under the impression that the order of morning business had closed.

Mr. WORKS. Morning business has not yet been closed, as I understand. I send to the desk an amendment which I desire——

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator from California will permit, I ask that the resolution go over under the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senator will permit the resolution to be read as it now stands, it will then go over under the rule. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations is hereby directed to inquire into and report to the Senate the number of men in the Diplomatic Service of the United States and in the Consular Service, the States from which appointed, the aggregate salaries of the appointees from the several States and the District of Columbia, and the political party with which such appointees were affiliated at the time of their appointment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over and be printed.

WASHED PAPER MONEY.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, if this is the proper stage of proceeding, I desire to present correspondence from 587 bank presidents and cashiers, representing every State in the Union, protesting against what is known as "washed money." I desire to ask that this correspondence be printed as a public document. My prompting in making this motion I feel is richly justified from this large amount of correspondence. I put myself in communication with the various banks of the country, and I have received protests, as I say, from 587 of them in every State of the Union, insisting that the method should be discontinued. For myself I feel that the country can not have too much of good, fresh, clean money.

I insist that after the Government having secured, as it has, the best art in the matter of engraving, thereby obtaining the deepest and most permanent colors, it ill becomes us to go through a Chinese laundering process of washing and fading out our money. This is the universal protest of bank presidents and cashiers throughout our country against this process of soapsuds and caustic soda by which the fine lines, the work of the artist and the engraver, have been practically obliterated and the colors destroyed so that it is impossible to detect whether or not notes are counterfeit.

I introduced some time since a paper, which was published as a document, entitled "Counterfeiters' delight," and its sentiments have been reechoed from one end of this country to the other. I feel that the United States Government, at least, is called upon to do as much as does the Government of Great Britain and the Governments of many other countries in turning out clean, fresh, crisp money. I have no sympathy with any process——

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. One moment. I have no sympathy with any process that shall keep alive and circulate among the people greasy, filthy rags, such as many that are now in circulation. I do insist that it should not be the business of a few men in the Treasury Department to establish machines to wash our paper money or to curtail its size. That is a matter which should be left with the people of the United States. Apropos of what I have said, I ask that this correspondence may be published as a document.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not like to interrupt the Senator from New Jersey, but I must insist upon the regular order.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I thought I had assent from the Vice President. I asked him if this were the proper stage at which to present this proposition, and, hearing nothing to the contrary, I assumed that it was.

The VICE PRESIDENT. May the Chair inquire whether the Senator's proposition is accompanied by a resolution?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. By only a verbal resolution, Mr. President.

Mr. SMOOT. It is a request from the Senator from New Jersey that certain letters which he has received be printed as a public document. The correspondence is all upon one subject, and, as I understand, there are 587 letters.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. There are 587 letters, representing every State in the Union.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I hardly think that it is necessary to have those 587 letters printed as a public document, especially they being all one way and all protesting against one single object. I believe the Senator will secure just as much publicity for the statement——

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I am not looking for publicity. The Senator from Utah is entirely in error. I want to say that there are four banks in the State of Utah, the Senator's own State, that protest most vehemently against this process. I want to present to you—and I think the Senator will not object—a letter signed by a former Member of this body, W. M. Kavanaugh, of Little Rock, Ark.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I must again insist upon the regular order. This is all out of the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is objection to the request, and it is not accompanied by a resolution——

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Well, I will reserve my privilege, and present the matter again.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there are not further concurrent or other resolutions, morning business is closed.

ASSISTANT CLERKS OR MESSENGERS TO SENATORS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I desire to call up Senate resolution 15.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution referred to by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], which was reported by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute. The proposed substitute will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committees on Coast and Insular Survey, on Enrolled Bills, on Expenditures in the Agricultural Department, on Expenditures in the Departments of Commerce and Labor, on Standards, Weights, and Measures, on Expenditures in the Department of State, on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game, on National Banks, on Public Health and National Quarantine, on Geological Survey, to Investigate Trespassers upon Indian Lands, on the Mississippi River and its Tributaries, on Pacific Railroads, on Railroads, on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard, on the University of the United States, on Woman Suffrage, to Examine the Several Branches of the Civil Service, on Indian Depredations, on Transportation and Sale of Meat Products, on Engrossed Bills, on the Five Civilized Tribes of Indians, on Additional Accommodations for the Library of Congress, on Private Land Claims, on Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments, on Revolutionary Claims, on Corporations Organized in the District of Columbia, on conference of the minority of the Senate be, and they are hereby, authorized to employ one assistant clerk each, at $1,200 per annum, to be paid from "miscellaneous items" of the contingent fund of the Senate until otherwise provided for by law: Provided, That if any of the committees recited above already have three employees the resolution shall not apply to them, except that this proviso shall not apply to the conference of the minority of the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am informed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] will not further insist upon the amendment which he offered at the last session of the Senate. I therefore move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say that that will be perfectly agreeable to the Senator from North Dakota. He asked me to make the same motion, and I want to explain to the Senate, inasmuch as he is absent from the Chamber at this time, that it is satisfactory to him.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment heretofore proposed by the Senator from North Dakota to the amendment of the committee in the nature of a substitute.

The SECRETARY. The amendment proposed by Mr. MCCUMBER was, on page 2, line 19, to amend the amendment by striking out "$1,200" and inserting "$1,400."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi to lay the amendment to the amendment on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the words "assistant clerk," in line 19, page 2, be stricken out and that the word "messenger" be inserted.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I accept the amendment, so far as I can.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 19, after the word "one," it is proposed to strike out the words "assistant clerk" and in lieu thereof to insert the word "messenger."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Utah to the amendment reported by the committee in the nature of a substitute.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee in the nature of a substitute as amended.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I think we ought to have a statement as to what the status of the measure will be as amended. The matter was before the Senate the other day, and there seemed to be very great differences of opinion as to what was the proper construction of this proposed measure. I should like to have it stated now what will be the status.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I suggest that the Secretary read the resolution as reported from the committee. The Senator can get the information he wants from that. It is perfectly plain.

Mr. SMOOT. Omitting the long list of committees.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Inasmuch as the Senator from Georgia wants to know what it is, the Secretary can read them.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I am induced to make the request from the fact that there was such a difference of opinion on a former occasion among Senators who are in favor of this measure as to what it meant. I want to know if they are now agreed upon it, and what it does include. Some Senators were of the opinion that it reduced all of these clerks or messengers, whichever you may choose to call them, to $1,200; but other Senators said that it only reduced a certain number of them to $1,200. Now, which is correct?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I suggest that the resolution explains itself, and, if the Senator desires the information, the resolution may be read. There is not a particle of doubt about what it means.

Mr. LODGE. The resolution, Mr. President, if I may say so, does not explain itself. It cuts down a certain number of men who are now receiving as messengers $1,440.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is no doubt about that fact. It is perfectly plain.

Mr. LODGE. That does not appear on the face of the resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It does appear on the face of the resolution.

Mr. LODGE. It is an inference naturally from it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no; what the resolution does is this: There are now upon the rolls of the Senate 10 so-called special messengers, who have been detailed at the request of Senators to serve certain committees. This resolution does away practically with the details, and enables Senators to appoint those men as messengers to their committees, whereupon they cease to be special messengers upon the general roll of the Senate, and immediately thereupon their salaries are reduced from $1,440 to $1,200, and all the nominal committees of the Senate, some of which now have $1,200 men and some have $1,440 men, are put upon an equal footing. These men were named to the special-messengers' roll by the Senators who wanted them, and the Senators who wanted them will want them again; but now they go off of that roll and go on the roll as messengers of particular committees, and they go off the special roll at $1,440 and go on a committee roll as $1,200 men.

Mr. LODGE. Precisely.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What I meant in saying that there could be no doubt about the resolution, was simply that there could be no doubt about that fact. The only danger is that the Sergeant at Arms might reappoint other men to fill the places of these men; but this is a party matter; it is done under the dictates of a majority caucus. I will say, by the way, that as an original proposition I was not in favor of giving any other assistance to seven or eight of these committees; but I am obeying that behest, and of course the Sergeant at Arms will obey it, and there will be no appointments to fill the vacancies upon the special list made by these appointments.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question. He speaks of a list of special messengers. Are not all messengers carried upon a general messenger roll or messenger list?

Mr. WILLIAMS. They are; but these 10 or 11 men, or whatever the number may be—I have forgotten the exact number—have already been detailed to serve these committees. Nobody will be appointed to fill their places as messengers.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I understand that; but the Senator was not strictly accurate when he said there was a special messenger list.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I meant a detailed messenger list.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Is there a detailed messenger list? Are not these men detailed from the general messenger list?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That is what I wanted to know. Now, will the Senator inform us how many are on the messenger list of the Senate?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know.

Mr. SMOOT. Thirty-seven.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I know that these 11 are there, and these 11 have been detailed.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. LODGE. There are 37.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Thirty-seven?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Thirty-seven. This will reduce the messenger list from 37 to 26, and we will take care of them when we come to the appropriation bill later.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee in the nature of a substitute for the original resolution as amended on motion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

Mr. VARDAMAN. I should like to have the resolution as amended read, so that we may understand exactly what it is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committees on Coast and Insular Survey, on Enrolled Bills, on Expenditures in the Agricultural Department, on Expenditures in the Departments of Commerce and Labor, on Standards, Weights, and Measures, on Expenditures in the Department of State, on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game, on National Banks, on Public Health and National Quarantine, on Geological Survey, to Investigate Trespassers upon Indian Lands, on the Mississippi River and its Tributaries, on Pacific Railroads, on Railroads, on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard, on the University of the United States, on Woman Suffrage, to Examine the Several Branches of the Civil Service, on Indian Depredations, on Transportation and Sale of Meat Products, on Engrossed Bills, on the Five Civilized Tribes of Indians, on Additional Accommodations for the Library of Congress, on Private Land Claims, on Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments, on Revolutionary Claims, on Corporations Organized in the District of Columbia, on conference of the minority of the Senate be, and they are hereby, authorized to employ one messenger each, at $1,200 per annum, to be paid from "miscellaneous items" of the contingent fund of the Senate until otherwise provided for by law: Provided, That if any of the committees recited above already have three employees, the resolution shall not apply to them, except that this proviso shall not apply to the conference of the minority of the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I want to make one explanation to the Senate about the last clause of the substitute. The minority conference have always had four employees. That is something that always has been granted by the majority to the minority, and of course we want to grant it now. Therefore this exception was made from the proviso.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the case, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute, reported by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, for the original resolution as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. KERN. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next at 12 o'clock meridian.

The motion was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL CIRCUIT JUDGE.

Mr. THOMAS obtained the floor.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield for a moment to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. CHILTON. I desire to move at this time what would be the regular order, as I understand—that we take up Senate bill 577, authorizing the President to appoint an additional circuit judge for the fourth circuit, and consider it.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Colorado has given notice that he desires to speak to-day immediately after the routine morning business.

Mr. CHILTON. That is true, and he has kindly allowed me to make this motion.

Mr. BRISTOW. The bill will cause considerable debate before it can be passed.

Mr. CHILTON. How much time will it take?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do not know. I want the Senate to understand just what it is doing. I think we had better let the bill go over and take it up some other day.

Mr. CHILTON. No; that does not suit me at all. This is the regular order, and I do not want it to go over. Of course, if it is going to take up the Senator's time, I will give notice that when the Senator finishes his remarks I will make this motion. I do not intend to have the bill keep going over all the time. It is the regular order; it is on the calendar; it is the only bill on the calendar; and I certainly can move to take it up or proceed with the regular order. I do not wish to disturb the Senator from Colorado, but I give notice that when he shall have finished, no matter when that time may be, I shall make this motion.

Mr. BRISTOW subsequently said: Mr. President, recurring to the bill to which the Senator from West Virginia has referred, I desire to say that I do not care to take any great length of time in discussing it. A very few minutes will satisfy me. If the Senator from Colorado is willing for it to be taken up now, I am perfectly willing that it shall be taken up and considered.

Mr. THOMAS. I was willing at the outset, Mr. President, but so much time has been consumed that I feel as though I should not be asked to yield the floor, because the matter might take more time than seems probable.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado has the floor.

AMENDMENT OF ANTITRUST ACT.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I call up the bill S. 112, striking out the words "unreasonable or undue" inserted by the Supreme Court of the United States into section 1 of the act of Congress of July 2, 1890.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate, and the Senator from Colorado will proceed.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I ask the Secretary to read Senate bill No. 112.

The Secretary read the bill (S. 112) to restore section 1 of the act of Congress of July 2, 1890, chapter 647, Twenty-sixth Statutes at Large, to its original form as enacted by striking out the words "unreasonable or undue," inserted therein by a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, introduced by Mr. THOMAS April 7, 1913, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the words "unreasonable or undue," inserted by the Supreme Court of the United States on May 15, 1911, by its decision of the case entitled "Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey et al. v. The United States," between the words "in" and "restraint of trade or commerce," where these words occur in section 1 of the act of Congress of July 2, 1890, chapter 647, Twenty-sixth Statutes at Large, page 209, commonly known as the antitrust act, be, and the same are hereby, stricken out and repealed, and that the said section of said statute be restored to its original form, structure, and meaning as the same was enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled.

SEC. 2. That in all actions, civil or criminal, now pending or to be instituted against any person or corporation for a violation of the provisions of said act, and in all appeal from or writs of error to review any judgment, decree, or conviction rendered or secured therein, against any person or corporation by the United States, or by any person or corporation, the courts of the United States shall interpret and apply the said act according to its terms, language, and provisions as the same was originally enacted and as the same will read as hereby amended, and not otherwise.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I am not accustomed to speaking from written manuscript. I prefer the more direct and satisfactory method of oral statement and discussion. I have made an exception, however, to the rule which I have generally followed, because of the importance, in my opinion at least, of the proposition which is involved in this bill, and also because I think it is a subject which requires precision of statement. I shall therefore trespass upon the patience of the Senate by reading what I have to say.

On the 15th day of May, 1911, the Supreme Court of the United States announced its opinion in the case of the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey and others versus The United States. The case had been submitted on March 16, 1910, after an oral argument of three days' duration. It was restored to the docket on April 11 following, and was reargued on January 12, 13, 16, and 17, 1911.

On May 29, 1911, the same court handed down its decision in the case of United States versus American Tobacco Co., which had also been twice argued and submitted. These decisions wrote qualifying words into a Federal statute which profoundly altered its meaning and restricted its purpose.

On July 26, 1911, the Senate referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce a resolution:

That the Committee on Interstate Commerce is hereby authorized and directed, by subcommittee or otherwise, to inquire into and report to the Senate at the earliest date practicable what changes are necessary or desirable in the laws of the United States relating to the creation and control of corporations engaged in interstate commerce, and for this purpose they are authorized to sit during the sessions or recesses of Congress, at such times and places as they may deem desirable or practicable; to send for persons or papers; to administer oaths; to summon and compel the attendance of witnesses; to conduct hearings and have reports of same printed for use; and to employ such clerks, stenographers, and other assistants as shall be necessary, and any expense in connection with such inquiry shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the committee.

In obedience to the requirements of this resolution, the committee conducted hearings extending over a period of more than three months, took much testimony, and made its report to the Senate on February 26, 1913. Its work was comprehensive. Its report is brief, concise, and illuminating. Whatever view may be entertained of the recommendations of the majority of its members, there can be but one sentiment as to the tremendous and immediate importance of the subject and the necessity for national legislation concerning it at the present session of Congress if possible—at the ensuing regular session in any event. And it is equally certain that this legislation should be comprehensive in its scope and unmistakable in its character; that it should be applicable to all persons and corporations engaged in interstate commerce; that it should be applied and enforced by executive agencies with promptness and efficiency, and that it should be relieved as far as Congress can relieve it from those perils of judicial decree which the existing law has encountered, with unfortunate results to it and to those whom it was designed to serve. Otherwise the enforcement of the antitrust laws, however complete in their purpose and clear in their details, will drift from the executive into the judicial department of the Government and, like some of their predecessors, be lost in the shoals and quicksands of construction and interpretation.

Believing that until the substance and the form of our scheme of government shall have undergone radical changes, some of which are concededly desirable, the power to legislate is vested in Congress, subject only to the Executive power of veto, I assert it to be both our right and our duty to make that power effective. It is our right under the Constitution. It is our duty if we would continue the right unimpaired and make our laws operative in the manner and to the extent that we enact them. The Federal courts long ago assumed the prerogative of pronouncing upon the validity of national statutes and have exercised it since the decision in Marbury against Madison. They have also exercised the right of construction, which is a perfectly legitimate one when confined to instances where language has been at fault with resulting ambiguities. And they have more recently changed the phraseology of a statute, which means legislation by decree. It is no reflection upon the integrity, the character, or the motives of judges to say this, for it is a self-evident fact and one which calls for counteraction by Congress if we would give effect to the popular demand as expressed in legislation. To do less is to renounce our powers in passive assent to their invasion by another department.

It was said many years ago that the power to interpret laws is the power which legislates. This is true, because the power may be and, in fact, is frequently applied to laws which are wholly free from ambiguity and which, therefore, interpret themselves. To undertake the construction of such a law is to distort its meaning and to change its application. This is but saying that such a law when interpreted is not the law as enacted; it is a different one, and becomes so by a process which is nothing less than legislation.

And the power to legislate by interpretation involves the power to interpret the same statute more than once and in more than one direction, so that the same law may be subject to change with every controversy that appeals to it for final solution. This is not a healthy condition of things, but it is far less dangerous to our institutions than one which rests upon the assumption of power to insert words and phrases into the body of a law by judicial decree. That is something more than interpretation; it is interpolation; it is legislating directly and specifically. And the power to interpolate words and phrases includes the power to strike out or subtract them whenever that may be the preferable or more expedient method of procedure. When one department of any government has authority to declare the laws of that government to be unconstitutional, to interpret their provisions when interpretation is to alter their meaning, to enforce them as interpreted to add words to or subtract words from them, and expound and enforce them as thus reconstructed, that department is supreme. It is a department in name only. Its attributes are sovereign in scope and character. It is the government for all essential purposes; and it is not a republican or representative government. It may be that the power to set aside laws of Congress because they are believed to be unconstitutional is indispensable to the integrity of our institutions. While I do not concede it, I enter upon no discussion of the question at this time. I shall content myself by referring to the historic fact that four attempts were unsuccessfully made by some of its framers to insert into the Constitution this power to declare laws invalid, each of which was rejected by decided majorities. From this I naturally infer that it has no place in our National Charter except as it has been located there by what is called "necessary implication." I maintain, however, that the common practice of interpreting statutes and the later one of adding words to them by the courts are the natural offspring of this assumed power to set them aside altogether. I am mindful of the fact that the courts have always declared that they can not invalidate a statute if they can construe it conformably with constitutional requirements; that is to say, to their view of such requirements. This not only suggests—it invites construction, and precedent begets precedent; so that construction is frequently invoked, whether the statute impinges upon the Constitution or not. One canon of construction is to ascertain and then apply the legislative intent which will not be presumed to be in conflict with the limitations of the Constitution, and such intent must be gleaned from the phraseology of the law. But this may prove a difficult task, in which case the judges sometimes recast the statute. And so the latest phase of the development of this prerogative, where the meaning of a statute is challenged, is that if the intent can not be ascertained from the language employed, or if such intent does not conform to the judicial view of what it should be, the addition of a word or two by the court will supply the intent as the court determines it should be, and the decree is entered accordingly. In its last analysis the statute is changed to suit the views of the court, although there may be nothing ambiguous or unconstitutional about it. Is it extravagant to assert that through the evolution of this power to invalidate the laws of Congress we are being transformed from a republican to a judicial system of government?

Congress is frequently compared to the British Parliament, and as frequently contrasted with it. The House of Representatives is supposedly analogous to the House of Commons. The American Senate is sometimes facetiously, sometimes seriously, called the American House of Lords. But apart from the fact that money bills must originate with the House of Representatives, there is little resemblance between it and the House of Commons. Our powers are now limited, not only by a written Constitution, but by another department which asserts and exercises the power to examine, to construe, to approve, to change, or to invalidate the laws we enact. They become effective at the pleasure of the courts. The real analogy to the British Parliament, therefore, is furnished by the Supreme Court of the United States. Its laws, like those of the Parliament, are supreme. Its decrees, like those of Parliament, are not subject to change unless itself shall so declare. The President may veto what we do here, but we can override his veto. And he, with all his authority, can not lawfully insert a punctuation point between two words in any act of Congress, while the courts, under the exercise of a jurisdiction which, though conferred by the Constitution, is regulated by Congress, may declare its meaning and amend or set it aside at discretion.

If these conditions are to continue, if they are to be treated as a permanent feature of our national polity, I can perceive no certain relief from the evils which the so-called Sherman Act was designed to mitigate through any additional legislation which Congress in its wisdom may enact. For we can not safely assume that such legislation, however framed, will not suffer the same judicial surgery so recently administered to the parent law. We may safeguard our action by every known precaution that language vouchsafes; we may declare what construction that language shall receive, and yet awake some morning to learn from the courts that we never meant what we said, or never said what we meant, or did not mean to say what we said, or should have said something more or something less than what we actually said, and which is said for us, because we did not say what we should have said. And this final pronouncement becomes the law, not for all the people, but for those involved in the particular case. It is subject to readjustment in successive stages of future litigation. We may again resort to legislation and thus seek to reach the evil, but reach instead the same or more undesirable result.

Mr. Jefferson foresaw and deplored these conditions. In 1820 he declared that if the judges became the ultimate arbiters of all constitutional questions, we would be placed under the despotism of an oligarchy. A year later he thus wrote to a friend:

> It has long been my opinion that the germ of dissolution of our Federal Government is in the constitution of our Federal judiciary, an irrepressible body (for impeachment is scarcely a scarecrow) working by gravity by day and by night, gaining a little to-day and a little to-morrow, and advancing its noiseless steps like a thief over the field of jurisdiction.

But Mr. Jefferson's wisdom, though beyond that of nearly all his contemporaries, could not foresee that the judiciary, though working like gravity, would ever assume the power to write into an act of Congress words that were never meant to be there, and which Congress deliberately refused to put there, thus profoundly changing its scope and meaning and thereby transferring to itself the authority to execute or suspend its provisions.

Such a power is more than arbitrary. It savors of despotism. It is incompatible with free institutions. The courts of no other nation ever dared to exercise it. The people of no other nation would tolerate it. Plato said that government, by whatever name it might be called, would always be the government of the strongest man. We may paraphrase this aphorism by asserting that our Government, though called republican, is the government of the Supreme Court. Clothed with authority to set aside, to construe, and to make laws, it is above Congress, above the President, above the Constitution, and above the people. It is omnipotent.

Nothing more vividly illustrates the constant extension of judicial authority, and the far-reaching scope of its overshadowing prerogative, than the history of the fourteenth amendment. This child of the Civil War was designed above all other things to confirm and guarantee the civil rights of the negro, and to safeguard him against the menace of unfriendly State legislation. But for this reason it probably would not have been presented, and certainly would not have been ratified by the States.

I am familiar, in a general way, with the debates which attended its course through Congress, and with the emphasis which the courts have in more recent times placed upon the larger field it was designed to cover, that property as well as life and liberty was insecure and needed the protection of the Federal authority. I know that Senator Conkling reminded the circuit court of the ninth judicial circuit, in 1882, that when the amendment was first considered individuals and joint-stock companies were appealing for congressional and administrative protection against insidious and discriminating State and local tax laws. But such considerations were in those days of reconstruction as chaff before the wind.

The rights of the newly emancipated negro appealed to the dominant political party for adequate protection. That party desired to enfranchise him and use his vote to perpetuate its power. It responded by presenting and ultimately forcing the passage and ratification of the fourteenth amendment. Its beginnings are found in a resolution offered in the House by Thaddeus Stevens on December 5, 1865, proposing an amendment in these terms:

> All National and State laws shall be equally applicable to every citizen, and no discrimination shall be made on account of race and color.

From this germ sprang the celebrated amendment whose several provisions were unfolded as discussion of the subject proceeded in committee and on the floor. Throughout all the deliberations of that memorable period the civil rights of the freedman was the dominant note, the cardinal subject of consideration. These found expression in various forms and finally in that which became effective by adoption and ratification. Of this I think there can be no dispute. I shall therefore refer but very briefly to the debates which attended its course through the Congress.

Senator Howard, of the Reconstruction Committee, said:

> It establishes equality before the law, and it gives to the humblest, the poorest, the most despised of the race the same rights and the same protection before the law as it gives to the most powerful, the most wealthy, the most haughty. Without this principle of equal justice to all men and equal protection under the shield of the law there is no republican government and none that is really worth maintaining.

Senator Poland, in urging the provision for the equal protection of the laws, said:

> It is the very spirit and inspiration of our system of government, the absolute foundation upon which it was established. It is essentially declared in the Declaration of Independence and in all the provisions of the Constitution. Notwithstanding this, we know that State laws exist, and some of them of very recent enactment, in direct violation of these principles. It certainly seems desirable that no doubt should be left existing as to the power of Congress to enforce principles lying at the very foundation of all republican governments if they be denied or violated by the States.

Similar expressions from the lips of leading statesmen of that eventful era might be quoted, but it is unnecessary. We know that human rights were the transcendent issue, and that property rights were entirely secondary to their consideration. It may be that the property interests quietly but effectively made a Trojan horse of the amendment, whereby they might sometime gain access to the heart of the citadel. Subsequent events justify this assertion, for they have been the chief if not the sole beneficiaries of the amendment. It is indeed a striking commentary upon the wisdom and forethought of man that a fundamental addition made to the Constitution of the United States to protect and to preserve and enforce the civil and political rights of 3,000,000 of newly made freedmen has by judicial construction and application for nearly 50 years been converted into an effective agency for the accomplishment of almost every end save that for which it was designed, and but for which it would never have been enacted.

The unfortunate people whom this amendment was chiefly intended to serve have been excluded from the ballot box and from juries. They have been subjected to discrimination in every direction. They have never been equal before the law. I say this in no spirit of criticism. I merely state a solemn truth. And these people have vainly appealed to the fundamentals of the fourteenth amendment and prayed for their vindication by the Federal courts many times through the intervening years. They have been told judicially that Congress was not empowered by the fourteenth amendment to enact so much of the civil-rights act of 1875 as was intended to secure equal accommodations at inns, places of public amusement, and in public conveyances without distinction of race or color, since the applicable provisions of the amendment have reference solely to State action (Civil Rights cases, 109 U. S., 3); that a State statute providing for separate railway carriages for the white and colored races and the assignment of passengers thereto according to their race deprived a colored person of no rights under the fourteenth amendment (Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S., 537); that the equal protection of the laws is not denied to colored persons by a State constitution which makes no discrimination against them in terms, but which grants a discretion to certain officers which can be used to the abridgment of the right of colored persons to vote and serve on juries, but it is not shown that its actual operation is evil, but only that evil is possible under it. (Williams v. Mississippi, 170 U. S., 213.)

These and kindred decisions largely conclude the application of the amendment to personal guaranties. Their reasonings are the result of earnest contention and quite as earnest consideration. I pass them with two reflections. The first is that they chronologically follow the cases of Bowman v. Lewis (101 U. S., 22), the Slaughter House cases (16 Wall., 36), and Re Virginia (100 U. S., 313), which held in effect that the main purpose of the last three amendments was the freedom of the African race, the security and perpetuation of that freedom, their protection from the white men who had formerly held them in slavery, and the prohibition of the States by the fourteenth amendment from abridging the privileges and immunities thereby granted.

The other reflection is that the decisions denying the application of the fourteenth amendment to the colored race challenged the vigorous disapproval of Justice John M. Harlan. He dissented in toto from the conclusions of his associates, and insisted upon giving to the amendment that effect which its framers designed, extending its provisions for the protection of life and liberty, and the vindication at all times of the privileges and immunities of the citizen.

But those who invoked the provisions of the amendment for the protection of property rights and the vindication of property claims were more fortunate. The story is a long one, too long for this discussion, perhaps, yet most illustrative of its purpose; for it is a history of construction, whereby the whole scope, purpose, and effect of a constitutional provision have been transformed.

It begins with the Slaughter House cases, reported in Sixteenth Wallace, page 36, where a monopoly sought to evade the regulations of a State statute by invoking the shelter of the fourteenth amendment through the claim of taking property without due process of law. The Supreme Court, in this the first important controversy involving the amendment, declared the primary purpose of the first clause thereof to have been designed to confer citizenship on the negro race, and, secondly, to give definitions of citizenship of the United States and citizenship of the States, recognizing by these definitions the distinction between them. That the second clause protects from hostile legislation the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States as distinguished from those of citizens of the States. That it was not necessary to inquire into the full force of the clause forbidding a State to enforce any law which deprives a person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, since that phrase had often been the subject of judicial construction and was under no admissible view of it applicable to the present case.

It also held that the clause which forbids a State to deny to any person the equal protection of the laws was clearly intended to prevent the hostile discrimination against the negro race, so familiar in the States where he had been a slave, and for that purpose the clause conferred ample power upon Congress to secure his rights and his equality before the law. The right of the Louisiana butchers to protection against the operation of the Louisiana statute from the fourteenth amendment was denied, and the slaughterhouse monopoly was destroyed.

This great case was heard and decided in 1872 by judges occupying the bench when, or immediately after, the amendment was adopted. They were personally cognizant of its history, its causes, and its objects. They were conversant with its authors, its advocates, and its opponents. The opinion was delivered by Justice Miller, one of the greatest judges who ever adorned the bench. In his conclusions he thus disposed of the complainants' contention as to their rights under the amendment:

> It would be the vainest show of learning to attempt to prove by citations of authority that up to the adoption of the recent amendments no claim or pretense was set up that those rights depended on the Federal Government for their existence or protection beyond the very few express limitations which the Federal Constitution imposed upon the States, such, for instance, as the prohibition against ex post facto laws, bills of attainder, and laws impairing the obligations of contracts. But with the exception of these and a few other restrictions the entire domain of the privileges and immunities of citizens of the States, as above defined, lay within the constitutional and legislative power of the States and without that of the Federal Government. Was it the purpose of the fourteenth amendment by the simple declaration that no State should make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States to transfer the security and protection of all the civil rights which we have mentioned from the States to the Federal Government? And when it is declared that Congress shall have power to enforce that article, was it intended to bring within the power of Congress the entire domain of civil rights heretofore belonging exclusively to the States? All this and more must follow, if the propostion of the plaintiffs in error be sound. The argument, we admit, is not always the most conclusive which is drawn from the consequences urged against the adoption of a particular construction of an instrument. But when, as in the case before us, the consequences are so serious, so far-reaching and pervading, so great a departure from the structure and spirit of our institutions, when the effect is to fetter and degrade the State governments by subjecting them to the control of Congress, in the exercise of powers heretofore universally conceded to them of the most ordinary and fundamental character; when, in fact, it radically changes the whole theory of the relations of the State and Federal Governments to each other, and of both these governments to the people, the argument has a force that is irresistible, in the absence of language which expresses such a purpose too clearly to admit of doubt. The argument has not been much pressed in these cases that the defendants' charter deprives the plaintiff of their property without due process of law, or that it denies to them the equal protection of the law. The first of these paragraphs has been in the Constitution since the adoption of the fifth amendment as a restraint upon the power of the States. The law, then, has practically been the same as it now is during the existence of the Government, except as far as the present amendment may place the restraining power over the States in this matter in the hands of the Federal Government. We are not without judicial interpretation therefore, both State and National, of the meaning of this clause and it is sufficient to say that under no construction of that provision that we have ever seen or any that we deem admissible can the restraint imposed by the State of Louisiana upon the exercise of their trade by the butchers of New Orleans be held to be a deprivation of property within the meaning of that provision:
> "Nor shall any State deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."
> In the light of the history of these amendments and the pervading purpose of them, which we have already discussed, it is not difficult to give a meaning to this clause. The existence of laws in the States where the newly emancipated negroes resided which discriminated with gross injustice and hardship against them as a class was the evil to be remedied by this clause, and by it such laws are forbidden.

Four years afterwards Munn against Illinois was decided. In that great case it was held that down to the time of the adoption of the fourteenth amendment it was not supposed that statutes regulating the use or even the price of the use of private property necessarily deprived an owner of his property without due process of law. Under some circumstances they may, but not under all. That the amendment does not change the law in this particular; it simply prevents the States from doing that which will operate as such deprivation. That when the owner of property devotes it to a use in which the public has an interest he, in effect, grants to the public an interest in such use and must, to the extent of that interest, submit to be controlled by the public for the common good as long as he maintains the use. He may withdraw his grant by discontinuing the use. That rights of property, and to a reasonable compensation for its use, created by the common law, can not be taken away without due process; but the law itself, as a rule of conduct, may, unless constitutional limitations forbid, be changed at the will of the legislature. That the great office of statutes is to remedy defects in the common law as they are developed and to adapt it to the changes of time and circumstances. That the limitation by legislative enactment of the rate of charge for services rendered in a public employment, or for the use of property in which the public has an interest, establishes no new principle in the law, but only gives a new effect to an old one. (94 U. S., 113.)

The doctrine of these two cases seems incontrovertible. Its steady application to subsequent controversies involving them would have made trusts and combinations impossible. There could have been no trust question at this time to vex the liberties of the people or confound the faculties of statesmen. It was recognized and enforced in the so-called Granger cases and some others, but the decisions were obnoxious to the purposes and developments of the great property interests. They were analyzed, criticized, dissented from, and denounced by certain sections of the press, by some of the law magazines, by lawyers, by laymen, and by some of the judges on the bench. Capital expressed concern, as it always does when laws and constitutions are expounded and enforced in opposition to its purposes, "lest investments be impaired and progress halt"

These tactics and influences have long since prevailed, and the principle announced and applied in the Slaughterhouse and Illinois cases have been asphyxiated by a continued process of adverse construction. It is true that no subsequent opinion expressly disapproves them. They are still occasionally quoted with that solemn dignity that is the due of the living to the dead, but their force and vitality are gone. They gradually but surely yielded to the lingering and lethal malady of construction. Step by step the inflowing tide of new decisions, which defined, confined, distinguished, modified, and attenuated, has overwhelmed them. In the process State courts, State statutes, the rules of the common law, the ordinances of great municipalities, the checks and balances of State constitutions, and solemn enactments of the Congress of the United States have been swept away. In consequence the authority of the Federal courts has been stretched over the entire domain of civil and criminal jurisprudence. The humblest controversies of these days are magnified into alleged transgressions of the sacred restrictions of the fourteenth amendment, relating to property rights, and Federal jurisdiction therefore attaches. All known forms of litigation either knock at the door of the Nation's courts or are carried there for determination under the far-reaching arm of the fourteenth amendment. It is said that 30 per cent of the business of these courts relies on that amendment for their jurisdiction, about 15 per cent of which involves its application to the facts in controversy. Every institution operating under charter, every person enjoying a franchise and claiming immunity from taxation or from local interference, every emigrant corporation from another State or from across the sea which fears or challenges the regulation of the local authority, every overcapitalized enterprise dropsical with watered bonds and stocks, demanding the right to tax its patrons without regard to its actual investment, every promotion dreading the inquisitorial powers of State tribunals operating under State laws, seek and find shelter under the protecting aegis of the fourteenth amendment as it has been defined, enlarged, and extended by the judicial authority of the Nation.

I shall not trace the development of this polity in detail. Anyone can do so who cares to arm himself with a digest of the Federal decisions. I feel impelled, however, to refer to some of its earlier stages.

As Justice Harlan dissented from the decisions invoking the principles of the amendment to safeguard the rights of persons, so Justice Field dissented from those in the Slaughterhouse case and in Munn v. Illinois, which involved the rights of things. That dominating personality declared at the outset for every demand of property under the amendment. His resentment toward the prevailing opinions of his brethren in these early cases breathes through every line of his vigorous protests. They are written in the spirit and with the zeal of the partisan. Those who challenged the soundness of the majority opinions found ample material for their opposition in his virile periods, and doubtless had an abiding faith in his ability to make them ultimately effective.

The opportunity came in California in 1882, in the case of San Mateo County v. The Southern Pacific Railway Co. (13 Fed., 722.) The railway company there contested the validity of certain taxes assessed by some of the counties of California against its property, and invoked the so-called prōperty clause of the fourteenth amendment for the defeat of the tax. Mr. Justice Field journeyed to San Francisco to hear and decide it. The railway company employed illustrious counsel to defend its contention. Among them were Roscoe Conkling and George F. Edmunds, who were Senators of the United States when the fourteenth amendment was enacted. These noted lawyers gave all their great talents to the cause. Their arguments were historical as they were legal. The accounts they then gave of the amendment's history have been since quoted in arguments and in the decisions in subsequent controversies. They prevailed in the instant case, and Justice Field incorporated them in a zealous opinion followed by judgment for the railway company. The following year this opinion was duplicated by the same justice in the cases of Santa Clara County v. Southern Pacific Co. (16 Fed., 385.) These decisions were written in deliberate disregard of the doctrines of the Supreme Court in the Slaughterhouse and Illinois cases. Mr. Justice Field in his last opinion did not so much as refer to either of them, although he quoted copiously from the arguments of Conkling and Edmunds in the San Mateo case.

Both were taken to the Supreme Court. The first was dismissed upon the ground that there no longer existed a cause of action. (116 U. S., 138.) The second was a series of cases which were affirmed because the tax complained of was void under the constitution and laws of California, in consequence of which the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States was not involved at all, hence Justice Field's elaborate dissertations upon it in the court below were entirely outside the record. (118 U. S., 394, 417.)

To this result he submitted, but with poor grace.

I regret—

Said he (p. 422)—

that it has not been deemed consistent with its (the court's) duty to decide the important constitutional questions involved, and particularly the one which was so fully considered in the circuit court, and elaborately argued here, that in the assessment upon which the taxes claimed were levied an unlawful and unjust discrimination was made between the property of the defendant and the property of individuals, to its disadvantage, thus subjecting it to an unequal share of the public burdens, and to that extent depriving it of the equal protection of the laws guaranteed by the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution.

The learned justice then proceeds very frankly to say why his regret is so profound. He continues:

At the present day nearly all the great enterprises are conducted by corporations. Hardly an industry can be named that is not in some way promoted by them, and a vast portion of the wealth of the country is in their hands. It is therefore of the greatest interest to them whether their property is subject to the same rules of assessment and taxation as like property of natural persons, or whether elements which effect the valuation of property are to be omitted from consideration when it is owned by them and considered when it is owned by natural persons, and thus the valuation of property be made to vary, not according to its conditions or use, but acording to its ownership. The question is not whether the State may not claim for grants of privileges and franchises a fixed sum per year or a percentage of earnings of a corporation—that is not controverted; but whether it may prescribe rules for the valuation of property for taxation which will vary according as it is held by individuals or by corporations.

Mark, now, the prediction:

The question is of transcendent importance, and it will come here and continue to come until it is authoritatively decided in harmony with the great constitutional amendment which insures to every person, whatever his position, the equal protection of the laws.

The learned justice was not content with the decision of the court that the things he clamored against were prohibited by the constitution and laws of the State of California. He was eager to crystallize his construction of the amendment into the law of the land, and impatient of his inability to do so in the instant case, while prophesying with truth that the corporate interests of the land would persevere in their efforts until their interests and ambitions rested under the shadow of the "great amendment."

It is an axiom of the law that those parts of a decision which are obiter dicta or unessential to the decision itself are outside the case. They are not authoritative. They may be persuasive but nothing more. Hence Justice Field's pronouncements in the California Tax cases in the circuit court have no place in the domain of case law. Yet I do not hesitate to affirm that they have for over 30 years been the magazine from which most of the weapons have been drawn for the demolition of the Slaughterhouse and Illinois decisions. During that period I have tried many cases and read many briefs involving the Protean phases of the fourteenth amendment, and have yet to be confronted with one which does not find its ultimate lodgment in these opinions. They prevailed long before Justice Field passed away. He lived to see them triumphant, to see the fourteenth amendment "authoritatively decided in harmony" with his conclusions. And he also lived to invalidate the decisions of his own court for a hundred years sustaining the power of Congress to levy an income tax, and to deny that authority to the National Government. This he regarded as an assault on capital. He said in the Income Tax cases (157 U. S., 607):

The present assault on capital is but the beginning. It will be but the stepping-stone to others larger and more sweeping till our political contests become a war of the poor against the rich, a war constantly growing in intensity and bitterness. If the purely arbitrary limitation of $4,000 in the present law can be sustained, none having less than that amount of income being assessed or taxed for the support of the Government, the limitation of future Congresses may be fixed at a much larger sum—at five or ten or twenty thousand dollars—parties possessing an income of that amount alone being bound to bear the burdens of government, or the limitation may be designated at such an amount as a board of walking delegates may deem necessary.

The learned justice thus clamored against the exercise of a legislative power which through the exigencies of war or insurrection might become indispensable to the Nation's very existence; a power wielded by every other nation in the world, a power sustained by the court itself from the beginning of its history. But it was wholly inconsistent with his own point of view, which long before had become the standard of his judicial utterances.

The contrast between himself and his great associate is graphically portrayed in Justice Harlan's comment upon the majority view of the court in these cases:

I can not assent to an interpretation of the Constitution that impairs and cripples the great powers of the National Government in the essential matter of taxation and at the same time discriminates against the greater part of the people of our country. The practical effect of the decision to-day is to give to certain kinds of property a position of favoritism and advantage inconsistent with the fundamental principles of our social organization, and to invest them with power and influence that may be perilous to that portion of the American people upon whom rests the larger part of the burdens of the Government, and who ought not to be subjected to the dominion of aggregated wealth any more than the property of the country should be at the mercy of the lawless.

While my own judgment coincides with the correctness of Justice Harlan's view, I intend no aspersion of the motives or sincerity of those who, like Justice Field, entertained the opposite one. Both these great jurists were men of transcendent ability, of irreproachable character, of undoubted patriotism. Each believed in the integrity of his own and the unsoundness of the other's convictions. Each felt and portrayed the deplorable consequences which in his judgment must ensue from the prevalence of the adverse doctrine, and each asserted in the most vigorous English his own contention. They only represented and expressed from the bench that eternal contest between government by the few and by the many, between oligarchy and democracy, between Hamilton and Jefferson—a conflict which can not be adjusted, which began with the earliest glimmerings of popular government, and which will never end until the last shall wholly triumph.

It is no disparagement of Mr. Justice Field, but rather a tribute to his dominating personality and powerful intellect, to assert that through his persistency the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States has been largely substituted for the Constitution itself, that it is now far and away the most important if not the most vital portion of that great instrument, and that in exalting it to this position its guaranties of life and liberty have shrunken into comparative unimportance. No word has been written into or taken from its structure. Construction has been the magic wand of its transformation. But who that defends the right to thus change a statute can affirm that the courts may not, should their judgment so decree, thus qualify or enlarge the Constitution itself by the prevailing judicial practice of addition and subtraction? What argument can be advanced to support the one which does not as well apply to the other? Why may not the wisdom or the emergencies of the future demand the same heroic methods of treatment for both statutes and constitutions? Those who regard the courts as sacrosanct may shudder at the thought of such a sacrilege, but I have yet to learn that the usurpation of power by any ruler halts with the first assertion of its exercise. The usurper—executive, legislative, or judicial—never belonged to the stand-pat wing of any party. He is compelled by the very fact of his usurpation to move on. He is a progressive in spite of himself, and his goal is only attainable by repeated acts of added usurpation.

The question is not whether the judicial arm of the Government would or would not exercise so dangerous a prerogative if possessed of it. We may safely assume that it would not, especially as that arm is now constituted. The question is whether the existence of such a power anywhere is compatible with the institutions of the country, and whether modern expansions of judicial power are not leading up to it. Apprehension, suspicion, fear itself are admirable qualities in the citizens of a republic. When aroused by the action of the ruler, they become potent elements for the preservation of the country's institutions. I am always glad to see public sentiment inflamed when anything unusual in government occurs. I rejoice when protests and unfriendly criticism follow the action of the public servant, and more so when they are stimulated by omissions of public duty. These things manifest a healthy condition of the body politic. "Look not for a time," said Wendell Phillips, "when the people are quiet and safe. At such a time despotism like a shrouding mist steals over the mirror of freedom." The sea keeps pure because it is ever in agitation. And republics are possible only when the tides of public comment and criticism ceaselessly ebb and flow.

Nothing in recent years has so powerfully arrested public attention and directed it toward the growing power of the judiciary as the Standard Oil and Tobacco decisions. The average citizen caught his breath when he heard them. The press held them up to the public gaze and turned them around and around so that they could be seen from every direction. Learned lawyers and essayists condemned and commended them. Preceding decisions involving the same statute and announcing totally opposite conclusions became familiar to everyone. The order of their occurrence is so admirably outlined in pages 4 to 10, inclusive, of the committee's report that I ask permission to here incorporate them in my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the matter will be printed as requested.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The committee selects for the purpose indicated the following cases, all of which arose under the statute now being considered:

United States v. E. C. Knight Co. (156 U. S., 1).
United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Association (166 U. S., 290).
United States v. Joint Traffic Association (171 U. S., 505).
Hopkins v. United States (171 U. S., 578).
Northern Securities Co v. United States (193 U. S., 197).
Standard Oil Co. v. United States (221 U. S., 1).
United States v American Tobacco Co. (221 U. S., 106).
United States v. Union Pacific Railroad Co. (not yet reported, opinion delivered Dec. 2, 1912).

The committee does not give a statement of the facts in each of these cases, for to do so would greatly prolong the report, and it will be taken for granted that those who are interested in the subject are already familiar with the facts as they appear in the Supreme Court reports.

The rule of law announced in United States v. Knight Co. and in Hopkins v. United States is that a restraint of trade however unreasonable is not prohibited by the antitrust statute, no matter how general or disastrous the interference or restraint may be upon commerce among the States, unless it directly affects such commerce. There is a general understanding among the judges and lawyers of the country that the Knight case has been overruled or modified in subsequent decisions. Undoubtedly it can be fairly inferred from the recent opinions of the court in like cases that, if the facts of the case were now presented, it would be held that the restraint was direct; but the rule of law established has never been questioned by the court and has been emphatically reasserted in every prominent opinion hitherto rendered. The committee does not bring these cases forward for the purpose of disputing the soundness of the rule under existing legislation. Its object is to disclose, as clearly as possible, the scope of judicial discretion, and therefore of business uncertainty which it creates. In every prosecution under the act wherein there is proven or admitted a contract or combination which restrains trade among the States, the first thing that the court must ascertain and declare is whether the restraint is direct or indirect. In the Knight and Hopkins cases, and others of that type, it was held to be indirect. In the Northern Securities Co., Standard Oil Co., and American Tobacco Co. cases it was held to be direct. It is obvious that the opinion of any given man in any given case upon this question, whether he be judge or not, must depend largely, not upon his learning in the law but upon his training and bent in the economy of commerce. The result has been, and necessarily will be, that the law officer of the Government before he institutes a prosecution must determine whether the restraint is direct and immediate, and the court in order to decide the issue must employ the functions of the legislator rather than the lawyer.

The consequence is twofold: First, the Department of Justice will ignore a great many unlawful transactions because there will be doubt as to whether the interference with interstate or international trade is direct or indirect; second, the business community has found itself, and will find itself, in a state of uncertainty as to whether a particular transaction is to be judged by the law of the State or the law of the Nation. It is not claimed that this undefined and undefinable field of judicial discretion can be wholly occupied by legislation, but it is manifest that it is the duty of the legislative branch of the Government to circumscribe it within the closest practicable bounds. The committee will recur to this subject in connection with another aspect of the judicial power, and contents itself now with a statement of its conclusion that there should be further legislation specifically prohibiting certain forms of association, combination, or monopoly which admittedly restrain trade and commerce among the States and with foreign nations, but which may be held by the courts to be indirect or remote interferences.

The committee has first referred to the point just mentioned, not because it is first in importance but because it first arose. It now passes to another and more serious weakness in the law as now interpreted.

In the Trans-Missouri Freight Association case there developed a controversy among the members of the Supreme Court that was carried on with unabated vigor through the 15 years intervening between the opinion in the Freight Association case and the opinion in the Standard Oil Co. case. In this period the vicissitudes of life and the changes upon the bench which necessarily ensued converted the opinion of the court in the Freight Association case into a single dissenting opinion in the Standard Oil Co. case, and the dissenting opinion in the former case into the opinion of the court in the latter case. In the Freight Association case Mr. Justice Peckham, in delivering the opinion of the court, said:

"Second. The next question to be discussed is as to what is the true construction of the statute, assuming that it applies to common carriers by railroad. What is the meaning of the language as used in the statute that 'every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations, is hereby declared to be illegal'? Is it confined to a contract or combination which is only in unreasonable restraint of trade or commerce, or does it include what the language of the act plainly and in terms covers, all contracts of that nature" (p. 327)?

The learned justice answered the question thus propounded many times and in great variety of phrase in the course of the opinion, and the committee quotes some of these answers.

"When, therefore, the body of an act pronounces as illegal every contract or combination in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, etc., the plain and ordinary meaning of such language is not limited to that kind of contract alone which is in unreasonable restraint of trade, but all contracts are included in such language, and no exception or limitation can be added without placing in the act that which has been omitted by Congress (p. 328).

"But we can not see how the statute can be limited, as it has been by the courts below, without reading into its text an exception which alters the natural meaning of the language used, and that, too, upon a most material point, and where no sufficient reason is shown for believing that such alteration would make the statute more in accord with the intent of the lawmaking body that enacted it (p. 329).

"The arguments which have been addressed to us against the inclusion of all contracts in restraint of trade, as provided for by the language of the act, have been based upon the alleged presumption that Congress, notwithstanding the language of the act, could not have intended to embrace all contracts, but only such contracts as were in unreasonable restraint of trade. Under these circumstances we are, therefore, asked to hold that the act of Congress excepts contracts which are not in unreasonable restraint of trade, and which only keep rates up to a reasonable price, notwithstanding the language of the act makes no such exception. In other words, we are asked to read into the act by way of judicial legislation an exception that is not placed there by the law-making branch of the Government, and this is to be done upon the theory that the impolicy of such legislation is so clear that it can not be supposed that Congress intended the natural import of the language used. This we can not and ought not to do (p. 340).

"The conclusion which we have drawn from the examination above made into the question before us is that the antitrust act applies to railroads, and that it renders illegal all agreements which are in restraint of trade or commerce as we have above defined that expression, and the question then arises whether the agreement before us is of that nature" (p. 341).

The issue was clearly joined by Mr. Justice White (now Chief Justice), who in his dissenting opinion, in which Justices Field, Gray, and Shiras concurred, thus stated the question:

"To state the proposition in the form in which it was earnestly pressed in the argument at bar, it is as follows: Congress has said every contract in restraint of trade is illegal. When the law says every, there is no power in the courts, if they correctly interpret and apply the statute, to substitute the word 'some' for the word 'every.' If Congress had meant to forbid only restraints of trade which were unreasonable it would have said so; instead of doing this it has said 'every,' and this word of universality embraces both contracts which are reasonable and unreasonable" (p. 345).

The distinguished justice begins his answer to the proposition just quoted as follows:

"I commence, then, with these two conceded propositions, one of law and the other of fact, first that only such contracts as unreasonably restrain trade are violative of the general law, and, second, that the particular contract here under consideration is reasonable, and therefore not unlawful if the general principles of law are to be applied to it" (p. 344).

Again:

"Its title is 'An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies.' The word 'unlawful' clearly distinguishes between contracts in restraint of trade which are lawful and those which are not. In other words, between those which are unreasonably in restraint of trade, and consequently invalid, and those which are reasonable and hence lawful" (p. 352).

Again:

"If these obvious rules of interpretation be applied, it seems to me they render it impossible to construe the words 'every restraint of trade' used in the act in any other sense than as excluding reasonable contracts, as the fact that such contracts were not considered to be within the rule of contracts in restraint of trade was thoroughly established both in England and in this country at the time the act was adopted" (p. 354).

Again:

"Indeed, it seems to me there can be no doubt that reasonable contracts can not be embraced within the provisions of the statute if it be interpreted by the light of the supreme command that the intention of the law must be carried out, and it must be so construed as to afford the remedy and frustrate the wrong contemplated by its enactment" (p. 355).

It will be noted that but once in the dissenting opinion is the word "unreasonable" used to qualify the phrase "in restraint of trade." It is generally employed to qualify the word "contract." There is some difference between saying that there may be a reasonable interference with competition or freedom in trade or freedom to trade which did not, at the common law, constitute a restraint of trade, and saying that there can be, under our statute, a reasonable restraint of trade. But this was only the beginning.

Two years later the suit of the United States v. Joint Traffic Association came on for decision. Again Mr. Justice Peckham delivered the opinion of the court, and upon the point we are considering there seems to have been no change in the attitude of the members of the court toward it. It is instructive to observe, however, that in referring to Hopkins v. The United States, in which the opinion was handed down at the same term, the learned justice said:

"In Hopkins v. The United States, decided at this term, post, 578, we say that the statute applies only to those contracts whose direct and immediate effect is a retraint upon interstate commerce * * * the effect upon interstate commerce must not be indirect or incidental only" (p. 568).

Five years thereafter the well-known Northern Securities case was decided, and the struggle was renewed with intense earnestness. Mr. Justice Harlan rendered the opinion of the court, and this is the way he stated the question:

"Is the act to be construed as forbidding every combination or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the States or with foreign nations? Or does it embrace only such restraints as are unreasonable in their nature? Is the motive with which a forbidden combination or conspiracy is formed at all material when it appears that the necessary tendency of that particular combination or conspiracy in question is to restrict or suppress free competition between competing railroads engaged in commerce among the States? Does the act of Congress prescribe, as a rule for interstate or international commerce, that the operation of the natural laws of competition between those engaged in such commerce shall not be restricted or interfered with by any contract, combination, or conspiracy?" (p. 328).

In answering the question he probably goes a little further than Justice Peckham. He states as the conclusion to be drawn from former opinions of the courts:

"That the act is not limited to restraints of interstate and international trade or commerce that are unreasonable in their nature, but embraces all direct restraints imposed by any combination, conspiracy, or monopoly upon such trade or commerce; * * *. That every combination or conspiracy which would extinguish competition between otherwise competing railroads engaged in interstate trade or commerce, and which would in that way restrain such trade or commerce, is made illegal by the act; * * *. That to vitiate the combination, such as the act of Congress condemns, it need not be shown that the combination in fact results or will result in a total suppression of trade or in a complete monopoly, but it is only essential to show that by its necessary operation it tends to restrain interstate or international trade or commerce or tends to create a monopoly in such trade or commerce and to deprive the public of the advantages that flow from free competition (p. 331).

"Whether the free operation of the normal laws of competition is a wise and wholesome rule for trade and commerce is an economic question which this court need not consider or determine. Undoubtedly there are those who think that the general business interest and prosperity of the country will be best promoted if the rule of competition is not applied. But there are others who believe that such a rule is more necessary in these days of enormous wealth than it ever was in any former period of our history. Be all this as it may, Congress has in effect recognized the rule of free competition by declaring illegal every combination or conspiracy in restraint of interstate and international commerce" (p 337).

Mr. Justice Brewer was with the majority of the court in the Trans-Missouri Association case, and he concurred in the decision in the Northern Securities Co. case; but upon the question we are discussing he rejected the reasoning of Justice Harlan and adopted the views expressed by Justice White in the former case. He said:

"Instead of holding that the antitrust act includes all contracts, reasonable or unreasonable, in restraint of interstate trade, the ruling should have been that the contracts there presented were unreasonable restraints of interstate trade, and as such within the scope of the act. That act, as it appears from its title, was leveled at only 'unlawful restraints and monopolies.' Congress did not intend to reach and destroy those minor contracts in partial restraint of trade which the long course of decision at common law had affirmed were reasonable and ought to be upheld. The purpose rather was to place a statutory prohibition with prescribed penalties and remedies upon those contracts which were in direct restraint of trade, unreasonable, and against public policy. Whenever a departure from common-law rules and definitions is claimed, the purpose to make the departure should be clearly shown. Such a purpose does not appear and such a departure was not intended" (p. 361).

The Chief Justice and Justices White, Peckham, and Holmes dissented. Justice White, while discussing many phases of the relation between the General and the State Governments, finally rested his opinion upon the Knight case, holding that there was no direct restraint of interstate commerce. Justice Holmes, while concurring with Justice White, took occasion to say, in substance, that the method adopted by the defendants for the suppression of competition did not constitute a restraint of trade in the sense of the antitrust law.

With the Northern Securities case there terminated one distinct, striking period in the interpretation and application of the antitrust statute. It is needless to inquire at length whether or not the views of the court, as expressed in the opinions of Justices Peckham and Harlan, were in exact harmony with the common law as to the meaning or definition of the phrase "restraint of trade." Even if these learned judges were not quite successful in distinguishing the difference, at the common law, between a restraint of competition and a restraint of trade it still remains true that for more than 13 years repeated decisions of the highest tribunal of the country had declared that every contract or combination which prevented free competition was a restraint of trade, and that, if the restraint directly affected commerce among the States, then the contract or combination was unlawful, under the first section of the act.

Inasmuch as the committee is of opinion that legislation should be so clear in its terms as not to admit of unlimited judicial discretion, it pauses here a moment to point out just what the range of discretion was under the decisions ending with the Northern Securities case. It is manifest that the inquiry that the court was then required to make in each case was this: Has the evidence established a restraint of trade; that is to say, has the evidence established a contract or combination which interfered with free competition?

There was some, but not great, latitude for difference of opinion upon such an inquiry, and the uncertainty in the application of the law was reduced to a minimum; nor would the uncertainty have been much increased if the inquiry had been as to an unreasonable interference with free competition, which would have been the inquiry had the common-law understanding been strictly adopted by the Supreme Court.

If the more recent construction of the statute were in harmony with the earlier decisions, further legislation might nevertheless be required; but it is unnecessary to make the inquiry. That question is purely academic, for the later rulings have completely reversed the former ones, in so far as the phase of the subject now being discussed is concerned.

On the 15th day of May, 1911, the case of the Standard Oil Co. v. The United States was passed upon by the Supreme Court. Chief Justice White (formerly Justice White) delivered the opinion and reiterated, as the conclusion of the court, the views that he had so forcibly urged as a dissenter 15 years before. It was not necessary for the court to deal with the question at all, inasmuch as it found the defendants guilty of a restraint of trade under any and every meaning of the term, but for the very purpose, the committee assumes, of advising the country that a new rule had been adopted so that business might be guided by it, it was stated in the most emphatic way imaginable that the statute which declares that "Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations is hereby declared to be illegal" means that a contract or combination in order to be illegal must cause an undue restraint of trade. The following quotations from the opinion will need no comment:

"That in view of the many new forms of contracts and combinations which were being evolved from existing economic conditions, it was deemed essential by an all-embracing enumeration to make sure that no form of contract or combination by which an undue restraint of interstate or foreign commerce was brought about could save such restraint from condemnation. The statute under this view evidenced the intent not to restrain the right to make and enforce contracts, whether resulting from combination or otherwise, which did not unduly restrain interstate or foreign commerce, but to protect that commerce from being restrained by methods, whether old or new, which would constitute an interference that is an undue restraint" (pp. 59, 60).

Again:

"In other words, having by the first section forbidden all means of monopolizing trade—that is, unduly restraining it by means of every contract, combination, etc.—the second section seeks, if possible, to make the prohibitions of the act all the more complete and perfect by embracing all attempts to reach the end prohibited by the first section" (p. 61).

That the Chief Justice intended to announce a rule at variance with the declarations of Justice Peckham and Justice Harlan in the Trans-Missouri Freight Association and Northern Securities cases is made clear in the following extracts:

"The question is pertinent and must be fully and frankly met, for if it be now deemed that the Freight Association case was mistakenly decided or too broadly stated, the doctrine which it announced should be either expressly overruled or limited. * * * And in order not in the slightest degree to be wanting in frankness, we say that in so far, however, as by separating the general language used in the opinion in the Freight Association and Joint Traffic cases from the context and the subject and parties with which the cases were concerned, it may be conceived that the referred to conflicts with the construction which we give the statute, they are necessarily now limited and qualified" (pp. 68, 69).

The learned Chief Justice contends that this rule of construction, which he repeatedly calls the "rule of reason," must be applied in order to prevent the entire overthrow of the statute.

It is one of the interesting things in our judicial history that so great had been the change in the personnel of the court that when the dissenting opinion of Justice White in 1896 became the opinion of the court in 1911 Justice Harlan was the only member remaining to protest against the reversal. He recorded his dissent in one of the most vigorous opinions that can be found in the reports, but for the purposes which the committee has in view it is not necessary to do more than to mention it.

Justice Harlan has passed away, and it may be assumed that the Supreme Court is now unanimously in favor of the doctrine so often and so ably promulgated by Chief Justice White. The rule was reasserted in the American Tobacco Co. case and has not since been questioned by any member of the court.

It is true that in the important opinion rendered in the suit of the United States v. The Union Pacific Railroad Co., Justice Day says:

"The act is intended to reach combinations and conspiracies which restrain freedom of action in interstate trade and commerce and unduly suppress or restrict the play of competition in the conduct thereof"—

Citing as authority the Joint Traffic Association case.

It is true also that the court quotes, with apparent approval, the following extract from Mr. Justice Harlan in the Northern Securities case:

"In all the prior cases in this court the antitrust act has been considered as forbidding any combination which by its necessary operation destroys or restrains free competition among those engaged in interstate commerce; in other words, that to destroy or restrict free competition in interstate commerce was to restrain such commerce."

But thereafter the court says:

"In the recent discussion of the history of the meaning of the act in the Standard Oil Co. and Tobacco Co. cases this court declared that the statute should be given a reasonable construction with a view to reaching those undue restraints of interstate trade which are intended to be prohibited and punished."

The fair conclusion is that it is now the settled doctrine of the Supreme Court that only undue or unreasonable restraints of trade are made unlawful by the antitrust act, and that in each instance it is for the court to determine whether the established restraint of trade is a due restraint or an undue restraint.

Whatever may be the opinion of the several members of the committee with respect to the soundness of the rule as now established, the committee as a whole accepts it as the present law of the land. It is profoundly convinced that, in view of the rule and its necessary effect upon the business of the country, the inherent rights of the people, and upon the execution of the statute it has become imperative to enact additional legislation.

Mr. THOMAS. True to his convictions, Justice Harlan again dissented from the reasoning, although accepting the conclusions of his brethren in these later cases. His opinion, Two hundred and twenty-first United States, page 106, should be carefully read by every man and woman in the land. He emphasized the fundamental proposition that Congress alone could amend its laws, that it had expressly refused to make the specific amendment to the antitrust act, which the Supreme Court had determined to make on its own account, and closed his discussion with the solemn warning that—after many years of public service at the National Capital, and after a somewhat close observation of public affairs, I am impelled to say that there is abroad in our land a most harmful tendency to bring about the amending of constitutions and legislative enactments by means alone of judicial construction.

I think I have used no more forceful language, up to this time at least, Mr. President, than that employed by the learned justice. He continued:

The supreme law of the land—which is binding alike upon all, upon Presidents, Congresses, the courts, and the people—gives to Congress, and to Congress alone, authority to regulate interstate commerce, and when Congress forbids any restraint of such commerce in any form all must obey its mandate. To overreach the action of Congress merely by judicial construction—that is, by indirection—is a blow at the integrity of our governmental system, and in the end will prove most dangerous to all.

In a special message of July 7, 1910, to Congress President Taft said:

It has been proposed, however, that the word "reasonable" should be made a part of the statute, and then that it should be left to the courts to say what is a reasonable restraint of trade, what is a reasonable suppression of competition, what is a reasonable monopoly. I venture to think that this is to put into the hands of the court a power impossible to exercise on any consistent principle which will insure the uniformity of decision essential to just judgment. It is to thrust upon the courts a burden that they have no precedents to enable them to carry, and to give them a power approaching the arbitrary, the abuse of which might involve our whole judicial system in disaster.

Truer and wiser words were never uttered. Coming from such high authority they were entitled to unusual weight. They preceded the decisions by more than a year. When these came they contained no indication that the President's counsels had ever been heard, much less considered, by the majority of the court.

Having emphasized the evils associated with the judicial administration of the statute, and having declared that the amendment if made by Congress would impose upon the courts the duty of administering it, the country very naturally expected from the President some expression of disappointment if not of disapproval of the court's announcements. But with an easy complacence worthy of Polonius he hastened to express his approval of them. He voiced his satisfaction with their conclusions quite as vigorously as he had previously asserted his objections to them. They seemed to him to be consonant with the text of the law as they would be useful in the determination of future controversies arising under it. I do not wish to speak unkindly of our former Executive whose genial and companionable traits of character appealed strongly to all who came in contact with him and whose sincere desire to properly discharge the duties of this great office does not admit of question. But the best intentions are valueless when companioned by weakness and vacillation. The Executive who counsels with earnestness and with wisdom, but who applauds when his counsels are flatly rejected, can not long enjoy the confidence of the people or the respect of his coordinates. The President's change of front regarding this most important statute was one of the most unfortunate if not the most conspicuous of the many shifting policies of his administration, for it gave Executive sanction to a piece of judicial legislation against the enactment of which by Congress he had strongly and successfully protested. Moreover, he officially recognized the right of the courts to make and alter the laws of the Nation by judicial decree. The people were amazed at this inconsistency; they resented it, and their disapproval found subsequent expression in public discussion at the primaries, in the national conventions, and at the polling places. They have been impelled beyond all these. As the source and depository of all political power, they are asserting their right to finally determine for themselves the validity of the laws which their representatives make and which their courts transform. When they established this Government they divided its authority into three departments, coequal and coordinate. They do not view the usurpation by one of these departments of an authority conferred by them upon another with equanimity, and will prevent it if they can. They believe they can do so by setting these usurpations aside. That these acts of usurpation are called judicial decisions is beside the question. That does not detract from their inherent character nor mitigate their consequences.

The people are therefore beginning very seriously to consider whether they shall not appeal from these decisions to themselves and set them aside as they assume to set aside or reconstruct the laws of the land. Whether the people shall finally resolve to assert this right depends largely upon the courts themselves and upon such action as the Congress may take or may decline to take in the premises. It may be that the equilibrium between the departments can not be maintained; that the needs of the country have outgrown its continuance; that experience has demonstrated its impracticability. But if it is to be modified or readjusted or overthrown, we may be sure that the people will themselves ultimately so determine and rearrange the distribution of power as they shall deem desirable or necessary. Whether the process they adopt for the readjustment is to be the recall of decisions or some other process is unimportant. The fundamental factor in the equation is their right to make and enforce their own laws as a majority of themselves shall decide.

If Congress offends the electorate by running counter to its will, its Members may be recalled at the polls. If the President offends the electorate, he is shorn of his power by a withdrawal of popular confidence, and goes to the scrap heap at the end of his term. But if the courts persist in making or changing laws the people must seek other remedies, for the judges owe no tenure to the people. Between the courts and omnipotence nothing substantial intervenes. What, then, shall be done? The answer is obvious. It has been given, and the recall of decisions is on the high road of things that are to be.

I know full well that this power may be subject to abuse, but not more so, not as much so, in truth, as the abuse that has summoned it to the service of freemen. I know that the courts may be more deliberate than the mass, but the results of deliberation do not quicken and spread abroad the sense of injustice unless they be wrong. I know that the people in mass is called the mob, but the reproach is a slander on popular government. The people are always conservative. It was "the mob" which resisted the oppressions of the Crown, which sustained the newborn American Government, which condemned and overthrew the institution of slavery, which resists the encroachments of present-day plutocracy, and which is in rebellion against the exercise of political authority by the courts.

If those who decry or dread the potency of the recall can devise a better means of confronting and overthrowing this last manifestation of absolutism in a Republic, they owe it to themselves and the people to conceive and bring it forth, for the time for action seems at hand.

Solomon said there was nothing new under the sun. The assertion of the recall does not conflict with the wise man's precepts. It is a new name for an old theory; a new method of applying an old remedy. The right has been successfully asserted several times in our history. In Cohens v. Virginia (6 Wheat., 264) the Supreme Court held that it had appellate jurisdiction of a controversy in which a State was a party. The people promptly recalled the decision by adopting the eleventh amendment to the Constitution.

The alien and sedition laws were Dead Sea fruits of the first Adams administration. They were offensive to the people of that era. They were not in touch with the spirit of our newly founded Republic. They were vigorously and effectively enforced by grand juries and by the courts. They aroused the implacable hostility of the masses, who rose in revolt against them. The people overturned the administration which was responsible for them, destroyed the party which enacted them, and then struck them from the statute books. They recalled the President, the Congress, and the laws themselves. During the progress of their political battle they were called mobs, rioters, and the rabble, unfit for self-government, and a menace to all forms of law and order. Their leaders were stigmatized as demagogues and charlatans, appealing to the baser instincts of the multitude for the gratification of ignoble and dangerous ambitions. But the cause was the old one of privilege against the masses in one of its many forms, and the masses won. The recall became effective, and the abuse against which it was then directed was swept aside.

In Dred Scott v. Sanford (19 How., 393) it was held that Congress could not lawfully exclude slavery from the Territories. This decision was recalled by the people, speaking through the rattle of musketry and the thunder of cannon during four long years of strife and bloodshed. They achieved their purpose at an appalling sacrifice of blood and treasure, and crystallized their ultimate decree in the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution.

It was held in the Income Tax cases that the Nation was without authority to raise revenues by that method. The sixteenth amendment has recalled the edict, and until some other decision shall narrow its purpose or deny its efficacy the General Government may lay the burdens of its operations upon wealth as readily as upon consumption.

I realize the force of the criticism that recall by constitutional amendment is the exercise of a fully conceded authority, while recall by popular vote is wholly beyond and above the recorded ways. But we can not amend the Constitution with the occurrence of every bad decision. The process is a tedious and involved one. It is not always possible of accomplishment. Nor can we longer rely upon its efficacy, for if laws can be interlined by judicial decree, so may constitutions be interlined. As laws have been made over by judicial construction, so clauses of the Constitution have been made over by judicial construction. The progress of a malady frequently makes ordinary remedies useless; the good physician resorts to more effective albeit more unusual ones when such an emergency confronts him.

The people of Great Britain and of her transoceanic dependencies, ourselves excepted, enjoy the blessings of liberty to a larger degree than any other nation. Their laws when enacted by Parliament are supreme. Their freedom needs no judicial guardian. They possess and exercise the power of recall. No majority of Parliament hostile to their will can survive. No serious division between their ministry and their commons can arise without being followed by a referendum. There the so-called mob hears, judges, decides, and acts for itself. Must we, their descendants, the inheritors of their institutions, shrink from the application of the same expedients when demanded by public exigency because conservatism retreats into its corner and protests against innovation?

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, if it will not interrupt the Senator, I should like to call his attention to the fact that the British Parliament since 1701, by the act of settlement, has exercised substantially the right to recall judges, and since that time they have had no trouble with their judges. Forty-eight of the States of the United States have two ways of removing judges. Thirty-six of the States have three ways of removing or recalling judges, and three States have four ways of removing judges. The United States can only recall by impeachment, a useless remedy except against criminal conduct.

Mr. THOMAS. I thank the Senator for his interruption.

The Rev. Myron Reed, a famous preacher of Denver, once said that the people might not always be right, but they always wabbled in the right direction. All of us, collectively, are the people, but the mass consists of those whom Lincoln called the common people, and whom he said the Lord loved, else he would not have made so many of them. These have always constituted the bone and sinew of the country, the very warp and woof of the national fabric. They make and mold the sentiment of the times. They shape our lines of action. They hold the Republic in the hollow of their hands. It is these people who are concerned in preserving our institutions, who are fully alive to the evils of the assertion and exercise of absolute power by any but themselves, and who propose in some effective manner to counteract its last and most sinister manifestation.

The proposal to strike from a statute a word not appearing upon its face is concededly paradoxical. It will doubtless be regarded by some as impossible; by others as absurd. Were conditions otherwise than as we know them to be, both these conclusions would be correct. But the law that is written upon the statute books is not the law that is enforced by the courts. They have rewritten it, and their record of the law supplants that of Congress for every practical and substantial purpose. As enacted by Congress, all restraints of trade were outlawed. As rewritten by the court, unreasonable restraints of trade are alone prohibited. The anomaly involved in the legislative repeal of an interpolated word is no more remarkable than was its insertion into the law by judicial enactment. The proposed repeal is nothing more than legislative restoration of the law to its normal status. If the act seems extraordinary, it must be remembered that the occasion requiring it is more so. If the method of our procedure is without precedent, it is because the exigency confronting us is of similar character. If we can not repeal the amendment of a national statute because the courts made the amendment, it must be equally apparent that the courts were without power to make it, and it is therefore void.

On the other hand, if such authority be lodged in the courts, any change they see fit to make in the laws is valid and binding upon all men. If that be true, the legislative power to amend and to repeal the laws extends to such changes as well as to the laws of its own creation. You can not deny to Congress the right to strike words out of a statute when inserted by judicial decree if you concede to the courts the power to so insert them. And the fact that the insertion does not appear upon the face of the law furnishes the strongest possible argument in support of the right to strike it out, for the law must be certain, explicit, and intelligible. All men are presumed to know it. None can plead their ignorance of it. Yet how can the law be known if its language is a lie and its recitals a mockery? The laws of Draco were suspended so far above the people that they could not read and therefore could not know them. All men have access to ours, but some of them mislead the reader, albeit their contents seem clear. To make them certain, to keep them explicit, every change in their structure or their substance should appear upon the statute books, and not buried under the ponderous phraseology of learned judicial opinions.

The amendment which I have proposed is demanded by the underlying principle of equality. Laws to be respected and effective must be impersonal and impartial. They must extend to and embrace all men alike. If aimed at particular classes, they must affect alike all members thereof. Failing this, they cease to be laws. They are pronouncements only. They crush some while exempting others. Their operation is spasmodic, fitful, and dependent upon conditions or contingencies whose existence or absence is determined by extraneous forces. They are invested with every element of painful uncertainty. Those who are immune to-day are to-morrow on the deadly circuit of their influence. Such a law is unworthy of a despotism; it should be impossible in a republic.

Such in effect, nevertheless, is our so-called Sherman law since the Standard Oil and Tobacco decisions. It is no longer of uniform operation. It is a yardstick that shrinks or stretches whenever invoked for public or private protection. It is controlled by a higher law called the rule of reason. This rule is lodged in the minds and is evolved from the mental processes of the judges. It holds the statute in solution and precipitates it or fails to do so, as every given case appears to warrant or require. Men can not safely embark in new enterprises or continue old ones while these uncertain and fitful conditions exist. That certainty of object and of expression which every statute should possess, that knowledge of their requirements and of the consequences of their breach to which every citizen is entitled, and that uniformity and impartiality of operation without which laws are tyrannies, oppressive, and unjust unite in demanding the immediate restoration of this important law to its original form and purpose. If this can not be done, it should be repealed unconditionally.

The people are seldom radical. They are law-abiding. They do not abuse their strength. They have never menaced any of the powers which they have delegated to their rulers. Every peril we have encountered, every abuse of authority, every perversion of the laws to untoward purposes, have proceeded from those who decry the populace, denounce them as mobs, deny their right to govern themselves. Two years ago the mayor of New York City said:

No one, however rich, need ever be afraid of the people. The people are not revolutionary by nature. They are never dishonest. Even in the French Revolution, when they destroyed prisons and fortresses, not a bank was looted. The Bastile was torn down, but the Bank of France remained undisturbed.

It is, of course, true that the people of France in the frenzy of the moment, with centuries of oppression behind them and with power to avenge their accumulated wrongs, indulged in wild excesses of retaliation. But we must remember that it was the same people who visited stern justice upon the heads of their own monsters, and that the French Revolution has by the long since recorded verdict of posterity been recognized as the greatest single step forward in the history of civilization. And while we fervently pray and fondly hope that the recurrence of such an event may never mark or mar the progress of the race, we must realize that the surest method of its avoidance is to recognize and remove the causes which wrought the great upheaval.

The right to sit in ultimate judgment upon the validity of our laws rests and should rest with the people. They possess all power not delegated to the Government. They have expressly reserved it. They never delegated to any department the power to set aside the laws made by their representatives, unless they delegated it indirectly or by necessary implication. But that could not be, for their delegates to the constitutional convention several times declined to do so by express action. If its possession by any department is essential to the existence or the continuance of the Government, they should delegate it. But they can not be estopped from denying that they have indirectly done so merely because they have so long submitted to its assumption and exercise. And since evolution has transformed the judiciary into a law-making body, a condition has been evolved which the body of the people will meet and overcome if Congress does not do so. We must therefore rise to the occasion lest we fall with it. Should we fail to act, ours will then be the responsibility.

The most sinister effect of these decisions upon the public mind, and which I deplore as much as anyone, is the strength they have added to the apprehension that the Federal courts lean toward privilege and away from the masses. Those who so believe ground their faith upon the antecedent decisions involving the same statute upon the shelter afforded to centralized industries by the provisions of the fourteenth amendment as construed and enforced, by the gravitation of practically all controversies affecting corporate action and organization to the Federal jurisdiction, and by the general trend of Federal decisions. However much these views may be condemned the fact that they are entertained and expressed by a constantly increasing number of men and women in every section of the Union is so obvious that it can not be overlooked. However well or ill founded the sentiment may be, we must reckon with and do what we can to correct it. Yet this is not merely difficult; it is impossible while they can find support in the decisions which are the equivalents of legislation, which relieve Congress of the consequences of enacting bad laws, if they are bad, by shaping them to the judicial view, and which deprive them of the merit of enacting good laws, if they are good, by recasting them into the judicial molds. The people must believe in the courts though they lose faith in all other governmental agencies, if the Republic shall endure. They will so believe so long as the courts conform both in the letter and the spirit to the limitations of the Constitution. If the popular confidence is ever wholly lost, the fault will not be theirs. It will be embedded in the history of the national jurisprudence, in the unfolding and the progress of its extension of power through the exercise of political authority, disguised under the forms of judgments and decrees.

Mr. President, since preparing my remarks upon this bill my attention has been called to Document 1106 of the Senate, a speech of Mr. Justice Holmes, delivered at a dinner of the Harvard Law Association in New York. I find among other admirable sentiments a passage that seems to me to be peculiarly apposite to this branch of the discussion. He says:

It is a misfortune if a judge reads his conscious or unconscious sympathy with one side or the other prematurely into the law, and forgets that what seem to him to be first principles are believed by half his fellow men to be wrong. I think that we have suffered from this misfortune, in State courts at least, and that this is another and very important truth to be extracted from the popular discontent. When 20 years ago a vague terror went over the earth and the word socialism began to be heard, I thought and still think that fear was translated into doctrines that had no proper place in the Constitution or the common law. Judges are apt to be naif, simple-minded men, and they need something of Mephistopheles. We, too, need education in the obvious—to learn to transcend our own convictions and to leave room for much that we hold dear to be done away with short of revolution by the orderly change of law.

Coming from such a high and pure source, Mr. President, I think I am justified in saying that it outlines a thought which has frequently occurred to me that the fear of something that is to come, which is expressed either by the word "socialism" or by some of its equivalents, has unconsciously, perhaps, thrown an influence about and around the judges of the courts as well as legislators and societies which expresses itself in preventing by some anticipatory course the things which are thus dreaded. Many decisions have been rendered which never ought to have been rendered, because they do not conform with the letter and spirit either of statutes or of constitutions. The singular thing is that history has not taught eminent men everywhere the great truth that nothing can arrest, although many things may impede, the general progress of humankind and the onward march of civilization. This fact is well expressed by the recent historian of the Roman Empire, who says that "when the times are ripe for great political changes neither parties nor statesmen can alter the stern logic of facts."

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, would it interrupt the Senator if I would put a question to him, or would he prefer to wait until he has completed his remarks?

Mr. THOMAS. If it is merely a question, I would be glad to answer it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It is a question that involves a short discussion.

Mr. THOMAS. Then I would prefer to finish, because I have already consumed more time than I should have done.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will question the Senator, then, with his permission, at the close of his speech.

Mr. THOMAS. So far as I am concerned, the Senator may do so, if the Senate will bear with us.

It has therefore seemed to me pertinent to introduce the bill to which my remarks have been directed, and which proposes to repeal the amendment of the so-called Sherman Act by the decisions in the Standard Oil and Tobacco cases, restore the law to its original phrascology, and take from the courts the power of future legislation upon the subject. That Congress has power to do this does not admit of doubt. That by so doing and by further legislation qualifying and restricting the appellate power of the Circuit and Supreme Courts, Congress can remove practically all the evils demanding the recall of decisions by popular vote seems to me reasonably clear. We may thus satisfy all sorts and conditions of men, including those who favor and those who fear this efficient weapon of modern political warfare.

The power to enact laws includes the power to amend or to repeal existing ones. This power has in recent times been unsuccessfully challenged in those States which have adopted the initiative and referendum as regards laws enacted by direct legislation. I know of no exception to it save as to laws relating to the issue of bonds and securities which are contractual in their nature and which are frequently made nonrepealable until the obligations created by them shall have been discharged. The fact that the courts have amended a statute should prompt instead of deter legislative action concerning it.

Surely an amendment so effected can not operate both to change the law and render it immune to legislative action, especially when, as here, the judicial amendment is one which the legislative body expressly refused to enact and one which largely defeats the purpose of the law by making its operation depend upon the court's own view of each particular case as it arises thereunder. For since this amendment nobody knows nor can know what the law against combinations in restraint of trade is. The law is what a majority of judges may determine it to be from time to time, and a majority of the judges on the bench to-day may not be the same majority next year. A majority of the judges thought very differently about the law three or four years ago. A future majority may go back to the previous opinions or reject all of them for some other and different one. This is a situation where the law and the discretion of the court are identical, and all because it has inserted the word "unreasonable" into the body of the law—a word general and indefinite in its meaning, one which defies the lexicographers and illustrates the epigram of George Eliot that we are sometimes unable to define a thing in language except by defining and distinguishing it from something else. Let us, therefore, bring order out of this chaos by restoring the statute to its original structure and prohibiting all future alterations of it save as they may be made by ourselves.

This action should be accompanied by a prohibition upon all the courts against any further or other alteration of the phraseology of the statute, a precaution equally desirable in all future legislation relating to the same subject, bills concerning which will, I presume, receive the early consideration of the Senate. Our refusal to do this will subject future laws to the same judicial perils which the pioneer statute has encountered and in the end may be made to express not what we meant but what the courts believe we should have meant.

The almost limitless range of the jurisdiction of the Federal courts should be restricted in the early future, and the appellate powers of the Supreme and circuit courts should be regulated without delay if we would check the rising tide of popular demand for the recall of decisions. I have said that the authority of the Supreme Court to alter a law on appeal rests upon acts of Congress. This is a fact with which all lawyers are familiar. As Congress gave so it may take away the unlimited right of review. It has done so in the past; the events of recent times require that it should do so again.

Section 2 of Article III of the Constitution declares that:

In all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, and those in which a State shall be party, the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction. In all other cases before mentioned the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions and under such regulations as the Congress shall make.

This clause confers appellate jurisdiction upon the Supreme Court, but the extent and mode of its exercise is left to the discretion of Congress. The latter may therefore impose, and has at all times imposed, such limitations upon the right of review as has seemed just and proper. Its power to do so has always been recognized.

It will be safest—

Said Hamilton—

to declare generally that the Supreme Court shall possess appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, and that this jurisdiction shall be subject to such exceptions and regulations as the National Legislature may prescribe. This will enable the Government to modify it as will best answer the ends of public justice and security. (Federalist, No. 81.)

When, in 1788, the Virginia convention assembled to ratify or to reject the proposed Federal Constitution, Patrick Henry argued earnestly against its adoption. One ground of his opposition was the rticle relating to the judiciary. He feared the extent to which the power therein conferred might be carried, and foresaw the annulment of laws enacted by the people's representatives. He warned his countrymen against the proposed Federation, and apprehended the possibility of forcible resistance to the aggressions of the Central Government.

Old as I am—

He said—it is probable I may yet have the appellation of rebel.

It was John Marshall, afterwards the great Chief Justice, who opposed him and who reassured the convention. Said he:

The honorable gentleman says that no law of Congress can make any exception to the Federal appellate jurisdiction of facts as well as law. He has frequently spoken of technical terms and the meaning of them. What is the meaning of the term "exception"? Does it not mean an alteration and diminution? Congress is empowered to make exceptions to the appellate jurisdiction as to law and to fact of the Supreme Court. These exceptions certainly go as far as the legislature may think proper for the interest and liberty of the people. (Elliot's Debates, vol. 3, p. 559.)

In his Lectures on Constitutional Law, Justice Miller (p. 345) says:

The Congress, therefore, can control very largely the appellate jurisdiction of the United States Supreme Court. It has been done so by passing laws at various times regulating that jurisdiction. One of its earliest enactments upon the subject was that no ordinary suit between individuals could come to the Supreme Court for revision unless the amount involved was over $2,000. It is now $5,000, and it has been urged that this should be enlarged to ten or twenty thousand dollars, either by the creation of some intermediate appellate tribunal or otherwise.

Judge Cooley declares in his Principles of Constitutional Law (p. 177) that—

The two very effective restraints which the legislature may interpose to the abuse of executive and judicial authority are: First, that which consists in the control over their jurisdiction; and second, the proceeding of impeachment. Much of executive authority comes, not from the Constitution, but from statute, and what is thus given may at any time be taken away. The same is true of the courts. Some of them are purely statutory courts and may be modified or abolished; all of them derive the most of their jurisdiction from statutes, and whenever this is abused it can be restricted or taken away. But it may also be modified or taken away on grounds of expediency or policy merely.

And Justice Story adds the weight of his great authority to the proposition in this language:

The appellate powers of the Supreme Court are not given by the judicial act of 1789. They are given by the Constitution. But they are limited and regulated by that act and other acts on the same subject. And when a rule is provided all persons will agree that it can not be departed from. (2 Story Con., 1773.)

If the power of Congress to strip the courts of appellate jurisdiction ever admitted of doubt, it was dispelled by the case of Ex parte McCardle and the legislation which determined and disposed of it. The student of American history will discover nothing of greater interest and importance than the events comprising that unique controversy, which illuminates with flash-light brilliancy the authority of the Congress to abridge the political attributes of the judiciary by laying an interdict upon the sources of its origin.

This case, like the fourteenth amendment, was an outgrowth of the Civil War. Among the acts of reconstruction was one which divided the Southern States into 10 military districts, the chief administrative heads of which were officers of the Army. This, like all the acts of reconstruction, was bitterly contested, not alone by the people of the South but by the President and his advisers. Under its operation northern as well as southern citizens were arrested for alleged offenses and their lives were placed in jeopardy. To relieve this unlooked-for condition the act of February 5, 1867, was passed, giving the right of appeal to the Supreme Court in habeas corpus proceedings arising under the reconstruction act. One W. H. McCardle, the editor of a newspaper in Mississippi, having been arrested on complaint charging him with libel and inciting to insurrection, availed himself of the benefits of the act, petitioned unsuccessfully for the writ, and appealed therefrom to the Supreme Court. His appeal was founded upon the contention that the reconstruction acts of Congress were unconstitutional and therefore void.

Popular sentiment voiced the impression that the Supreme Court would so decide, in which event the entire fabric of reconstruction would collapse, and with it the fortunes of the party which erected it. But that party controlled both Houses of Congress by formidable majorities, and their leadership was in the hands of the ablest men of the Nation. If the danger which menaced the very life of the party could be avoided by legislation, the pathway could be readily cleared. If not, the country must await the predicted catastrophe.

The leaders of the majority rose to the occasion. They invoked the authority conferred upon Congress by article 3, section 2 of the Constitution and determined to destroy the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court over the McCardle case. They accomplished their purpose by adding a short section to a pending bill, providing for writs of error to the Supreme Court in suits against revenue officers. This section merely repealed so much of the act of February 5, 1867—as authorizes an appeal from the judgment of a circuit court to the Supreme Court of the United States, or the exercise of any such jurisdiction by such Supreme Court on appeals which have been or may hereafter be taken.

This measure naturally evoked vindictive opposition, but was passed, vetoed, and passed over the veto, thus becoming a law; after which a rehearing of the McCardle case was granted. Counsel for appellant earnestly contended against the power of Congress to legislate a case out of the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court which had been taken there under existing laws, which had been argued and submitted, and which was on the eve of final decision, especially when such legislation, though general in terms, was notoriously and avowedly designed by its authors to affect that particular case. He said:

This court is coexistent and coordinate with Congress, and must be able to exercise the whole judicial power of the United States, though Congress passed no act on the subject. The judiciary act of 1789 has been frequently changed. Suppose it were repealed. Would the court lose, wholly or at all, the power to pass on every case to which the judicial power of the United States extended? This act of March 27, 1868, does take away the whole appellate power of this court in cases of habeas corpus. Can such results be produced? We submit that they can not, and this court, then, we further submit, can go on and pronounce judgment on the merits, as it would have done had not the act of March 27 been passed.

This case had been argued in this court fully. Passing then from the domain of the bar, it was delivered into the sacred hands of the judges, and was in the custody of the court. For aught that was known by Congress it was passed upon and decided by them. Then comes, on the 27th of March, this act of Congress. Its language was general, but as was universally known its purpose was specific. If Congress had specifically enacted "that the Supreme Court of the United States shall never publicly give judgment in the case of McCardle, already argued, and upon which we anticipate that it will soon deliver judgment contrary to the views of a majority in Congress of what it ought to decide," its purpose to interfere specifically with and prevent the judgment in this very case would not have been more real or, as a fact, more universally known. Now, can Congress thus interfere with cases on which this high tribunal has passed or is passing judgment? Is not legislation like this an exercise by the Congress of judicial power?

A more signal instance of deliberate interference with the decision of a specific existing controversy can not well be imagined. The law was retroactive in its operation, and intended to be so, since it deprived the court of jurisdiction duly acquired before its enactment; it was so designed because the law-making power apprehended the nature and dreaded the results of a decision perhaps already agreed upon. The court might with much reason and certainly with a large degree of contemporary popular approval have declined to recognize the ex post facto feature of the statute while bowing to the mandate in futuro, but it did not do so. The statute was recognized in its entirety by a unanimous bench, and the right of Congress to make exceptions to and regulate the appellate jurisdiction of the court, both as to pending and to future controversies, was fully upheld.

It is quite true—

Said the Chief Justice, speaking for the court—

as was argued by counsel for the petitioner, that the appellate jurisdiction of this court is not derived from acts of Congress. It is, strictly speaking, conferred by the Constitution. But it is conferred "with such exceptions and under such regulations as Congress shall make." It is unnecessary to consider whether, if Congress had made no exceptions and no regulations, this court might not have exercised general appellate jurisdiction under rules prescribed by itself. For among the earliest acts of the First Congress, at its first session, was the act of September 24, 1789, to establish the judicial courts of the United States. That act provided for the organization of this court, and prescribed regulations for the exercise of its jurisdiction. The source of that jurisdiction and the limitations of it by the Constitution and by statute, have been on several occasions subjects of consideration here. In the case of Durousseau v. The United States (6 Cranch, 312) particularly the whole matter was carefully examined, and the court held "that while the appellate powers of this court are not given by the judicial act, but are given by the Constitution," they are nevertheless "limited and regulated by that act, and by such other acts as have been passed on the subject." The court said further that the judicial act was an exercise of the power given by the Constitution to Congress of making exceptions to the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. "They have described affirmatively," said the court, "its jurisdiction, and this affirmative description has been understood to imply a negation of the exercise of such appellate power as is not comprehended within it."

The principle that the affirmation of appellate jurisdiction implies the negation of all such jurisdiction not affirmed having been thus established, it was an almost necessary consequence that acts of Congress providing for the exercise of jurisdiction should come to be spoken of as acts granting jurisdiction and not as acts making exceptions to the constitutional grant of it. The exception to the appellate jurisdiction in the case before us, however, is not an inference from the affirmation of other appellate jurisdiction. It is made in terms. The provision of the act of 1867 affirming the appellate jurisdiction of this court in cases of habeas corpus is expressly repealed. It is hardly possible to imagine a plainer instance of positive exception.

We are not at liberty to inquire into the motives of the Legislature. We can only examine into its power under the Constitution, and the power to make exceptions to the appellate jurisdiction of this court is given in express words.

What, then, is the effect of the repealing clause upon the case before us? We can not doubt as to this: Without jurisdiction the court can not proceed at all in any cause. Jurisdiction is power to declare the law, and when it ceases to exist the only function remaining to the court is that of announcing the fact and dismissing the cause. And this is not less clear upon authority than upon principle. It is quite clear, then, that this court can not proceed to pronounce judgment in this case, for it has no longer jurisdiction of the appeal, and judicial duty is not less fitly performed by declining ungranted jurisdiction than by exercising firmly that which the Constitution and the laws confer. (7 Wall., 512–514.)

The appeal was therefore dismissed, and since all others arising under the same laws were prohibited the latter continued in full force and operation until they had effectuated their purpose. They may have been invalid. Congress may have exceeded its powers in enacting them, but it made its will effectual by depriving the judiciary of all power to place its veto upon them. The time is at hand when it should place a similar restraint upon the courts with reference to its existing and prospective antitrust legislation. It will thus destroy the incentive to delay the operation and defeat the requirements of such laws by litigation challenging their validity and designed to substitute the social and economic views of the judges for those of the Nation. It will thus put an end to the transfer of the administrative functions of these laws from the executive to the judicial department, a transfer which is not only opposed to our theory of government but which renders them practically ineffective. For it is self-evident that if each alleged violation of the laws must go through all the tedious processes of litigation, and then be disposed of upon its own particular facts, their operation is blocked through the sheer inability of the courts to dispose of them. Moreover, each instance becomes a law unto itself, and the statute instead of being a rule of conduct may become a juggler's wand, performing wonders that serve to amaze and deceive. The counsel of St. Paul to be all things to all men should never operate as a rule of construction for the written laws of a self-governing people.

Judicial administration is not only uncertain and variable in its operation but tedious and expensive as well. The record in the Standard Oil case embraces about 12,000 pages of printed matter bound in 23 volumes. This consisted for the most part of testimony involving transactions covering a period of some 40 years. It was begun in November, 1906, and ran over a period of nearly 5 years. The Tobacco case presents a similar condition, having been commenced in July, 1907. The expense attending their prosecution was prodigious. Other equally important proceedings arising under the same law are dragging their slow length along, and generations may come and go while the long procession of offenders against the law marches wearily from the commencement of suits against them in the trial court to the court of last resort. The interval is apt to be occupied with proposed changes in the law, with certain changes of sentiment as to its efficacy, with profound distrust of those public officials charged with its enforcement, but hampered by the pitfalls and technicalities of judicial procedure. The first pronouncement, however compliant with the purpose of the statute, is apt to be attended with reasonings not at all in accord with previous ones emanating from the same source, and this stimulates dissatisfaction as it begets lack of confidence in the wisdom of the bench. Every argument conspires for the withdrawal of the administration of these laws from the courts, and this can be effectuated only by denying their right to invalidate or to review them.

The majority report of the committee declares that if the prevailing method "continues in force the Federal courts will, as far as restraint of trade is concerned, make a common law for the United States, just as the English courts have made a common law for England." But the English common law consists of rules and customs deriving their force from decisions, and proceeding from what the Supreme Court of the United States in Kansas against Colorado calls "a first statement" or original announcement of the doctrine followed by its application to a present controversy. This makes a precedent for the solution of future controversies of similar character, and the system is evolved through a long line of rulings. The common law does not proceed from statutes, nor can it prevail when a statute conflicts with or changes it. But that common law which the Federal courts will make, so far as restraint of trade is concerned, will found itself on written laws which are altered or amended by decree. It is, in other words, the change of the written statute which will constitute the national common law. No such system is possible in any other country; it can flourish here only by altering or setting aside the written mandates of the National Legislature. To call it a system of common law is a misnomer; it is an anachronism, indefensible by reason, unsupported by precedent, unwarranted by the Constitution, and condemned by the principles of justice.

The policy which I propose should be welcomed more heartily by the courts than by any other branch of the Government. The country, like the committee, "has full confidence in the integrity, intelligence, and patriotism" of the Federal courts, and the latter surely desire that such confidence shall continue unimpaired. If this is to be, they can not longer enjoy this "vast and undefined power in the administration of the statute under the rule which has been promulgated"; yet will they continue its exercise unless Congress intervenes and forbids it. The practice has prevailed too long to be voluntarily abandoned. It has crystallized into a habit whose indulgence naturally yields to the influence of opportunity.

The denial of the right of review will relieve the courts of a vast and ever-increasing responsibility. They will be no longer burdened with a duty whose proper discharge seems to require the making and the administration of laws. They will resume their proper function of expounding and applying statutes to the solution and determination of controversies. They will again take their normal places in the machinery of government and the apprehensions and resentment of men now justly aroused by their assumptions of political authority will pass away.

If Congress, when a Federal statute is changed by the judgment of a court, would at once annul the change by appropriate legislation, the evil would be largely minimized. But such a course, at all times difficult, might for many reasons be impossible in the presence of great exigencies. And Executive disapproval might at times render such legislation useless. It is far easier to insert "thou shalt not" in the body of a statute designed to correct a crying evil or to effectuate a needed change, and thus prevent the creation of a status, than to deal with the status after it shall have been created.

The majority report truly asserts that "the people of this country will not permit the courts to declare a policy for them with respect to this subject. If we do not promptly exercise our legislative power, the courts will suffer immeasurable injury in the loss of that respect and confidence so essential to their usefulness. It is inconceivable that in a country governed by a written Constitution and statute law the courts can be permitted to test each restraint of trade by the economic standard which the individual members of the court may happen to approve. If we do not speedily prescribe, in so far as we can, a legislative rule by which to measure the form of contract and combination in restraint of trade with which we are familiar, or which we can anticipate, we cease to be a government of law, and become a government of men, and, moreover, of a very few men, and they appointed by the President."

We have been becoming such a Government throughout the last 50 years. We have witnessed with but little protest the judicial transformation of the fourteenth amendment, the vast stretch of Federal jurisdiction through its potent and prolific agency, the shearing away of the national authority to tax incomes, the enactment of statutes by decree. A few more advances and the judicial department becomes the Government. The people are alive to the danger and are looking to us to avert it for them. They believe with Lincoln that "the candid citizen must confess that if the policy of the Government upon vital questions affecting the whole people is to be irrevocably fixed by decisions of the Supreme Court the instance they are made in ordinary litigation between parties in personal actions, the people will have ceased to be their own rulers, having to that extent practically resigned their Government into the hands of that eminent tribunal."

The duty resting upon us as the people's representatives because of these conditions should be recognized and performed. We should neither evade nor postpone it. The issue is a grave one. We must meet it calmly and with courage. We are vested with ample authority to dispose of it. The people who have clothed us with this authority expect us to exercise it. The cause is theirs. We must not fail them, nor falter. The Supreme Court amendment to the antitrust act should be repealed, and the courts forbidden to hereafter change its text or modify its prohibitions.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question. I have listened with great interest to his clear and strong speech, and no one can join more vigorously with him than myself in the denunciation of judicial legislation; but the question in my mind is as to whether this was a case of judicial legislation or simply a case of judicial construction. The Senator complains that the court read into the statute the word "unreasonable," and made the statute apply only to unreasonable restraint of trade. As I read the decision, the word "unreasonable" does not apply to restraint of trade, but simply to the restraint of competition. I understand the position of the court to be that they were called upon to determine what the words "restraint of trade" in the statute meant, and in discharging that duty they could not fail to recognize the fact that the words "restraint of trade" had a well-defined meaning at common law, and that doubtless Congress used those words in their common-law sense; and they held that at common law "restraint of trade" did not cover all restraints of competition; that at common law there were reasonable forms of restraints of competition that did not constitute restraint of trade and which were not subject to the condemnation of the law. If that be true, did the court go beyond its legitimate function in defining the words "restraint of trade"? Did the court go beyond its legitimate function when it declared that Congress used that term in the common-law sense? Did it go beyond its legitimate function when it declared that at common law a "restraint of trade" did not cover reasonable restraints of competition? Was not that all that the court decided in that case?

Mr. THOMAS. Does the Senator put that to me as an interrogatory?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I do not think that either the language or the intention of the court is susceptible of such a modified interpretation. It was not the first decision of that eminent tribunal which involved a construction of this law. Those familiar—and I assume that all lawyers are familiar—with the general course of decisions in which this law was sought to be applied to existing conditions, and which are admirably outlined in the report of the committee to which I have several times referred, know that various attempts were made to secure just that construction to which the Senator refers; but in each instance a majority of the court declined to do so, and, among other things, upon the ground that the use of the words "restraint of trade" had obtained a definite meaning at common law which meaning did not permit that construction.

I think that Judge Taft, afterwards President of the United States, in the Addyston Pipe case, in Eighty-fifth Federal Reporter, took that position, the case having been tried before him originally.

The Senator will, of course, also recall that in the Trans-Missouri Freight cases the emphatic pronouncement of the court was that the law meant what I have contended it must mean, and which does not admit of the modified construction or interpretation to which the Senator refers. He must also know an effort was once made to secure an amendment of that statute in Congress, and that the report of the Committee on Commerce, of which the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] was the chairman, to this body expressly pronounced against any such amendment or addition to the statute, and that the President of the United States himself, as I have shown, in a message to the Congress—I think it was in a message to the Congress—not only advised against a change, but pointed out the inevitable consequences of the change of the law as the Senator has interpreted the decision to have done.

I might also go further and call the attention of the Senator to the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Harlan in the identical case, which, to my mind, is the most emphatic, logical, and unanswerable refutation of that construction that can be found anywhere in the judicial literature of the country.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the Senate just for a moment in further reply to the point made by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS]. I had occasion, when the question came before the Committee on the Judiciary to amend the antitrust law, to examine into the subject, and made the report to which the Senator from Colorado has referred. I think Senators who will examine the common law—and I took pains to examine it on that occasion—will find that the doctrine of reasonable restraint or unreasonable restraint applies only in those cases at common law where a man sells out his business or trade in a given locality and agrees to abstain from engaging in that business for a limited period of time or within a limited area. In reference to that class of contracts, the doctrine of reasonableness applies; but to no other contracts, where it is simply a question of whether it is a general restraint or not. I think that is the common law of England, and there is nothing in any of the decisions to the contrary. So that any contention by the Supreme Court that such is the law is a mistake.

I recall the incident at that time, when the opinion was first delivered from the bench orally on a certain Monday, as is the custom of the court. Judging from the newspaper reports, the court used the term "reasonable" or "unreasonable," but afterwards, as Senators will find if they examine the opinion of the court, the court abandoned that phrase, and used the phrase "rule of reason," and I would suggest to the Senator from Colorado that he modify his bill so as to hit that particular phrase in the opinion.

ADDITIONAL CIRCUIT JUDGE.

During the delivery of Mr. THOMAS's speech,

Mr. THOMAS. I yield for a moment to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON].

Mr. CHILTON. I ask for the following unanimous-consent order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia submits a request for unanimous consent, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from West Virginia asks unanimous consent that on Monday, April 28, 1913, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 577) authorizing the President to appoint an additional circuit judge for the fourth circuit, and before adjournment on that calendar day will vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendments that may be offered, and upon the bill—through the regular parliamentary stages—to its final disposition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. BACON. What is the bill?

Mr. CHILTON. It is the bill to provide for an additional circuit judge for the fourth circuit.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears no objection, and the order will be made.

After the conclusion of Mr. THOMAS's speech,

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. J. Res. 62) making an appropriation for defraying the expenses of the committees of the Senate and House of Representatives authorized to attend and represent the Senate and House at the unveiling and dedication of the memorial to Thomas Jefferson at St. Louis, Mo., and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. BACON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 1 hour and 13 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock and 48 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, April 28, 1913, at 12 o'clock m.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate April 24, 1913.

SUPERVISING INSPECTOR OF STEAM VESSELS.

William J. MacDonald, of Michigan, to be supervising inspector of steam vessels for the fourth district in the Steamboat-Inspection Service, Department of Commerce, vice Joseph J. Dunn, deceased.

COLLECTORS OF CUSTOMS.

John J. Bell, of Michigan, to be collector of customs for the district of Huron, in the State of Michigan, in place of John T. Rich, whose term of office expired by limitation January 8, 1913.

William H. Berry, of Pennsylvania, to be collector of customs for the district of Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania, in place of Chester W. Hill, superseded.

COMMISSIONER OF LABOR STATISTICS.

Charles P. Neill, of the District of Columbia, to be Commissioner of Labor Statistics, Department of Labor.

AUDITOR FOR THE NAVY DEPARTMENT.

Edward Luckow, of Wisconsin, to be Auditor for the Navy Department, in place of Ralph W. Tyler, resigned.

AUDITOR FOR THE STATE DEPARTMENT.

Edward D. Hearne, of Delaware, to be Auditor for the State and Other Departments, in place of Frank H. Davis, resigned.

COLLECTORS OF INTERNAL REVENUE.

Hayes H. Lewis, of Florida, to be collector of internal revenue for the district of Florida in place to Joseph E. Lee, superseded.

James Coffey, of South Dakota, to be collector of internal revenue for the district of North and South Dakota, in place of Willis C. Cook, superseded.

COMMISSIONER OF FISH AND FISHERIES.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 24, 1913.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father in heaven, so move upon our hearts that the Godlike may be in the ascendency as we pass along life's rugged way; that we may leave in our wake a record of which we may justly be proud, which those who shall come after us may follow with impunity; that at the end of our earthy sojourn we may be fully prepared to enter upon the work which waits on us in the great beyond. For Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE NATURAL CONDITION OF LAKE TAHOE.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from California rise?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent that senate joint resolution 25, relating to citrus fruits in California, and house joint resolution 18, both of the Legislature of California, be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to print the resolution mentioned——

Mr. RAKER. Two of them.

The SPEAKER. In the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to get the attitude of the other side of the House on the question of printing memorials of legislatures in the RECORD. It is the practice to print these in the Senate. I notice nearly every day in the RECORD gentlemen drop in the basket a number of memorials or resolutions of legislatures. If it is the intention to allow one gentleman the privilege of having printed in the RECORD upon presentation in the House resolutions adopted by a legislature, I submit the same privilege should be extended to every other gentleman of the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that I think about the most harmless thing that a man can do is to print something in the RECORD. If it is couched in respectful terms and is orderly, I see no objection to a Member of the House printing something in the RECORD if he thinks it is of any benefit to anybody. As a rule, I think the place where you can bury a thing the deepest is in the record of this House.

Mr. MANN. A number of gentlemen on this side of the House, new Members, have already been to me at different times in the session and asked whether it was the practice and custom of the House to ask unanimous consent to print these resolutions in the RECORD. I have stated to those gentlemen it was not the custom of the House to do that——

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN (continuing). And hence they have been dropped in the basket. Take, for instance, a resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of New York. Every Member would have the same right to acquire some prominence in connection with the matter by asking unanimous consent to have the resolution printed in the RECORD, and how many times it might be printed I do not know. If that side of the House is not going to object, I do not know that I will, with the understanding that if other gentlemen ask that privilege it will not be objected to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I wish to say this to the gentleman from Illinois. I think that the question of unanimous consent must be determined in each instance, and we can not fix a uniform rule about them, and I would be unwilling now to make an agreement fixing a uniform rule, but I think the gentleman knows, so far as I am personally concerned, that I am not given much to making objections of that kind either on that side of the House or this side of the House.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Alabama, true, does not object, but somebody usually on that side of the House has objected in the last Congress.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER]?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. I desire to ask if it would not be a better practice for those Members desiring to print resolutions of this character in the RECORD to get unanimous consent to extend their remarks in the RECORD and then carry these resolutions as a matter of extension of their remarks, rather than ask the House for unanimous consent to have these resolutions printed.

Mr. MANN. That has always been the practice heretofore.

Mr. GARNER. That accomplishes the result that the Member desires, and at the same time it does not put the House in the attitude of giving unanimous consent to have these resolutions printed in the RECORD, and therefore each one taking the responsibility for having it done, but it then throws the responsibility on the one individual Member who extends his remarks.

Mr. RAKER. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to withdraw my request, and I then ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman already has that privilege, as has everyone in the House.

Mr. RAKER. That is not upon this bill.

The SPEAKER. Of course, these resolutions are on this bill.

Mr. RAKER. I have some more here that are not on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] a question. Was not there a regulation or a rule agreed to here during the last Congress that speeches that are printed under leave to print and similar matters to that should be printed in the back of the RECORD?

Mr. GARNER. In the back part of it.

Mr. MANN. There was no regulation. There was a general agreement to that effect.

The SPEAKER. Was it not a regulation by the Joint Committee on Printing?

Mr. MANN. I think not.

Mr. RAKER. My idea is to have these printed at the end of the proceedings to-day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to know this for the benefit of gentlemen who want to print speeches.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3321.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 3321) to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, with Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee in the chair.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULDEN].

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, as a business man and farmer, I desire to address the committee briefly on the tariff bill now under consideration.

That the country demands a revision downward, that the Payne law was unsatisfactory, and that certain reforms were needed was proclaimed yesterday on the floor of this Chamber by that stalwart Republican from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER]. Naturally, he claimed that the Democratic majority would be ultraradical and fail to meet the demands of the country to equalize the burdens of taxation and reduce the high cost of living.

Having trained so long in a camp granting special privileges to a few favorites, it is impossible for him to divest himself of the fetish of high protective duties. The wish is father to the thought in his case.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] makes no admissions of wrongdoing on the part of the Ways and Means Committee and the Republican Party of the Sixty-first Congress when he headed that committee and ably led his party on the floor of the House.

Apparently he has learned little or nothing by the disastrous defeat of his party two years ago and again in 1912. He is tied hand and foot to his idols, and I fear will never be able to appreciate the lessons of those two memorable campaigns.

It now only remains for the Democratic Party to pass the excellent bill before us.

While some of us plead for free cattle, free sheep, free eggs, free butter, and free wheat to keep pace with the items in this bill on the free list, such as lumber, wool, cotton, shoes, hides, swine, meats, milk, and so forth, we yielded in the end to the opinions of the majority in the Democratic caucus.

On eggs and butter the duty is cut in two as compared with the Payne law, thus reducing the cost to the consumer.

A tariff for revenue has been good Democratic doctrine preached from every platform throughout the land for years, finally winning in 1910 and 1912.

Truth is mighty and must prevail, and the aphorism of the martyred President Lincoln that you could "fool all the people a part of the time, a part of the people all the time, but not all the people all the time" was again exemplified in a forceful manner.

The woolen and cotton schedules are greatly reduced—from 25 to 60 per cent.

The metal, wood, wool, cotton, chemical, and glassware schedules were reduced to a revenue basis and must result in immense benefit to the people.

While cutting down the duties a due regard was had to the need of revenue for the expenses of the Government economically administered.

It became necessary to keep many articles on the dutiable list for this purpose, but a proper regard was always had to the consumers, who heretofore have borne more than their share of the burdens of taxation.

On the question of favoritism in the past by the Republican Party in protecting certain manufactures, notably steel, iron, glass, lumber, and woolen products, I may be able to enlighten the committee as to the results of this policy. Having made my home in Pittsburgh from 1875 to 1889, I am familiar with the records of many of the beneficiaries of the policy of our friends on the other side of this Chamber.

In the early sixties three gentlemen in moderate circumstances at the time purchased half interest in two small iron mills on the banks of the Allegheny River in Pittsburgh belonging to the late Anthony J. Kloman, whom I knew very well. One of these parties died a number of years ago. The two remaining are very wealthy indeed. One of them is fearful of dying rich and is endowing various institutions trying to spend his yearly income. He owns a house and grounds on Fifth Avenue, New York City, valued at $5,000,000, and an extensive estate in Scotland. It must be said of him that he is a most estimable gentleman, with brains and ability that enabled him to accumulate all his hundreds of millions, but largely through the favors granted him by our Republican friends in the shape of legislation.

In 1875 it was my privilege to occupy a suite of rooms on Smithfield Street and Sixth Avenue in the same city—just 38 years ago. I rented desk room to a young man who represented his uncle, then the owner of a flouring mill and some coke ovens south of Pittsburgh. He claimed that he did not wish to pay more than $10 per month.

This sum was agreed upon, and he was my tenant for several months. From this small beginning the gentleman has managed to accumulate, largely through the favoritism of a high protective tariff, two or three hundred millions of dollars. He is now building a home on Fifth Avenue, New York City, a residence to cost $3,000,000.

In 1876, just 37 years ago, in a visit to the Edgar Thompson Steel Works, at Braddock, near Pittsburgh, I observed a bright, intelligent looking young man engaged in manual labor in the yards. Upon inquiring of my friend, the manager, I was told that he had "blown in" from the Allegheny Mountains a few weeks previous, and that it was his intention of putting him in the office. That gentleman is conceded to be the best posted man on the steel industry in the world, and is rated above $100,000,000. He, too, owns a magnificent residence on Riverside Drive, New York City, occupying an entire block and valued at $5,000,000.

It has been my privilege to know all three of these gentlemen, and can testify to their moral worth and their standing as citizens. They are gentlemen of the highest probity in business, and no criticism nor censure can be visited upon them for the great success achieved. The fault lays entirely with the system in vogue in this country since the Civil War, inaugurated and maintained by the Republican Party.

These cases could be multiplied many times over in the various protected industries of the country. The protection of "infant industries" and "to maintain a high standard of wages for the American workman" was the plea that made the continuance of high protective duty look well to the people, fooling them for years. It is now conceded that the first should have been stopped many years since, and the latter never did protect the laboring man; the latter maintained decent living wages only through the power and influence of well-organized unions. There is something radically wrong with a system of government that produces such results. It destroys competition and kills opportunities. It was responsible largely for the great trusts of this country, that finally became a menace to free government. The good old Democratic doctrine, "equal opportunities to all and special privileges to none," should, and will, prevail under the present tariff bill.

Now, a few words on the proposed income tax, which is a part of the bill under consideration. While not satisfactory in some respects, it is the most equitable and just measure for the honest distribution of the burdens of taxation. It puts the tax where it properly belongs—on men and women with incomes exceeding yearly $4,000. The section to which I took exception was that under "G," placing sums returned as dividends or premium abatements on life and endowment policy contracts of life insurance. It is contended by the policyholders and the companies themselves that all mutual organizations, like fraternal societies giving insurance, should have been exempt entirely from this law.

The committee have placed mutual fire insurance companies and mutual savings banks on the exempt list, while mutual life insurance companies, on analogous lines and collecting in advance more premiums than are necessary to cover their prospective liabilities, are taxed. Inasmuch as these mutual fire insurance companies and mutual savings banks are entirely relieved from taxation under paragraph G, as above mentioned—a very excellent ruling, by the way—why should not the same be applied to mutual life insurance companies? The so-called dividend or abatement of premium is not in any sense an earning or a profit. It arises from three sources: First, a more favorable mortality than that expected by the careful selection of risks; second, a higher rate of interest than that provided for by law on reserves; third, a saving in the expense charges provided for administration purposes. It is evident to every fair-minded person that no tax should be placed upon this item, as it is in the nature of a double tax, being deducted from the abatement upon policies of life insurance. It is a charge upon the frugality of the millions of insured members who have taken this step to provide for dependent ones or for old age. The act of August 28, 1894, section 32, provided that—

> Nothing herein contained shall apply * * * to any insurance company or association which conducts all its business solely on the mutual plan and only for the benefit of its policyholders or members, and having no capital stock, and no stock or share holders, and holding all its property in trust and in reserve for its policyholders or members; nor to that part of the business of any insurance company having a capital stock and stock and share holders which is conducted on the mutual plan, separate from its stock plan of insurance and solely for the benefit of the policyholders and members insured on said mutual plan, and holding all property belonging to and derived from said mutual part of its business in trust and reserve for the benefit of its policyholders and members insured on said mutual plan.

The decision of the Committee on Ways and Means to expedite the passage of this bill, so that the business interests may know what to expect, is highly commendable. While it may not suit everybody nor provide for the various interests affected, it is upon the whole a sane, safe, patriotic measure that must eventually secure the purposes in view. The fair and equitable adjustment of the tariff on a revenue basis—the only justification for a tariff tax—will result in bringing about the needed relief to the great masses of consumers of the country.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. HAMMOND].

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Chairman, although the custom duties furnish a little better than $300,000,000 annually for the support of the Government and the internal-revenue taxes furnish but little under the same amount for the Government's maintenance each year, there is no controversy of moment concerning the latter form of taxation. But about the tariff there has raged a controversy from the beginning of the Government up to the present time. In every political campaign since 1872, save the campaign of 1896, the tariff has been the important question. The public press has been replete with editorials and utterances concerning it. Congressional debate is full of it, and it constitutes a great portion of our private conversation. I suppose more speeches have been made about the tariff than about any other one subject connected with American politics. It is natural, where there is so widespread an interest and so much discussion, that there should be many different opinions, and therefore we have a great variety of ideas, theories, and notions concerning this very important matter.

Differences of opinion are found not only between the great political parties in the country, but between members and factions of the same political party. We have those who believe in an absolute sweeping away of all tariff duties. They are the free traders. We have the high protectionists, who believe the tariff duties should be raised so high that nothing could come into this country that might compete with an American product. We have those who believe in gradual reductions, and others who favor sweeping reductions, and recently a distinguished Democrat, the governor of one of our oldest Commonwealths, presented in a semiofficial way his views of the subject. He appears to hold that at the base of all lies reciprocity; that the necessaries of life, save only those that are manufactured in the State of which he is governor, should be admitted free of duty; and that all the raw material used in the manufactures of that great State should also be free of duty—a proposition that can not fail, when properly apprehended, to be extremely popular in the section of the country in which he resides. But possibly it will not excite so much enthusiasm among those who produce the necessaries of life and the raw materials in other parts of our territory.

Now, for a great many years there has been a feeling in this country, well-nigh universal, that the tariff duties ought to be reduced in amount, and there have been many earnest advocates of tariff reduction on both sides of this Chamber. In my opinion, the greatest danger to the establishment and continuance of low tariff rates is in the unyielding mental attitude of the extremists on this tariff question. I admire the high protectionist. I believe he is a somewhat extravagant patriot; I think his patriotism savors of chauvinism; but, nevertheless, he feels in his heart that this country of ours is so good that nobody else in the world should have any part of it or should have any opportunity in it, and that everything that is good and valuable about it should be retained and held for those who, like himself, love it. One can not help but admire the loyalty of that kind of doctrinaire.

Then there are others that I also admire—men who take a broad view of all the world's commerce and say, "Let us be of a great fraternity and trade and deal with one another and be commercial brothers." The high protectionists and the free traders make it difficult to secure a genuine tariff revision downward. The first, when the power is with them, raise the duties so high and make them so prohibitive that the people revolt and place the power to make rates in other hands; then if the free traders have their way about it the cuts will be so deep and the free list so large the shock will cause a change of sentiment, and, as a distinguished Member of this House so often said, the pendulum will swing the other way and we will go back to high protection.

Between these extremes lies a middle course, a safe and a sane one, which, if followed, will, in my judgment, lead to a substantial reduction of tariff duties, and the new rates when written in the statute book will remain there long enough for the country to become accustomed to them, and prosperity will bless the effort, enterprise, and labor of a great people at peace and content. [Applause.]

The Democratic Party is not a free-trade party. It has never, so far as I know, declared in favor of free trade. I take it that the fundamentals of the Democratic doctrine may be found in that celebrated declaration in the report of Secretary Walker, and while, as opinion and sentiment have changed throughout the country, there has been sometimes a leaning one way and then another way, after all this declaration, in the main, has been adhered to by the Democratic Party. I desire to read, if I may, the six cardinal principles laid down by him:

First. That no more money should be collected than is necessary for the wants of the Government economically administered.

We speak of a tariff for revenue only, and we mean by that a tariff levied for the purpose of raising revenue; not alone a tariff upon articles that are unlike those produced in this country, but a tariff levied upon various articles for the purpose of obtaining revenue for the wants of the Government. And this bill is in accord with the proposition which I have read. The amount to be raised should equal that needed for the conduct of Government affairs, economically administered.

Second. That no duty be imposed on any article above the lowest rate which will yield the largest amount of revenue.

Reiterating the purpose and the object of levying tariff duties; not to protect this industry or to encourage that industry, but to secure the needed funds to carry on the Government's affairs.

Third. That below such rate discrimination may be made, descending in the scale of duties, or for imperative reasons the article may be placed in the list of those free from all duty.

We have seen fit—we, the majority in this House—to place many articles in this bill upon the free list, because we believe that there were and are imperative reasons why that should be done. An eminent English historian said:

Ideas which change the face of the world spring from nations in a state of suffering, not from nations in comfortable circumstances.

There is now demand for legislation to relieve those who bend beneath the burden of constantly advancing cost of the necessaries of life. We seek to bring about a change of condition before the people suffer. We look into the future to discover, if we can, what will come if there be no change. We bring this reform measure into the House to prevent increased suffering and to lighten the burdens the people must bear so long as they live under the present laws. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Fourth. That the maximum revenue duty should be imposed on luxuries.

Fifth. That all minimums and all specific duties should be abolished, and ad valorem duties substituted in their place, care being taken to guard against fraudulent invoices and undervaluations, and to assess the duty upon the actual market value.

The House majority, of course, know that ad valorem duties are subject to criticism. From the protectionist standpoint strong and valid criticism may be made. The lower the price of the taxed article the greater the need of protection, but if the rate is ad valorem the less the amount of duty to be paid. The higher the price of the taxed article the more need of importations, but the greater the amount of the duty the more the check upon such importations. But this is from the outlook of the protectionist, who is not much concerned with the tariff as a producer of revenue.

We acknowledge the danger of fraudulent importations; but we believe that, upon the whole, the best results will be obtained—not from the protectionist's standpoint, but from a tariff-for-revenue standpoint—in these ad valorem rates; and in the new bill, wherever we found it possible to avoid a specific duty we did so, and made the rate ad valorem instead.

Sixth and last—and I was about to say best—that the duty should be so imposed as to operate as equally as possible throughout the Union, discriminating neither for nor against any class or section.

Gentlemen, we may disagree upon tariff rates; we may disagree upon tariff theories—you may be for protection, you may be for free trade, you may be for a tariff for revenue—but there ought to be no disagreement among us upon the proposition that, whatever rates are adopted, there should be no discrimination against any class of our people or against any section of our country. [Applause.]

I desire to call the attention of the House to a remarkable change that is now taking place, and has been taking place for a number of years. I refer to the proportionate decrease in the amount of our exportations of foodstuffs and the proportionate increase in our exportations of manufactured articles. The figures are to me somewhat startling.

In 1880 the total value of our manufactures exported amounted to $122,000,000; in 1890, $179,000,000; in 1900, $485,000,000; in 1912, $1,020,000,000. A remarkable growth, indeed.

In 1880 the share of our foodstuffs in our total exportations was 55.8 per cent; in 1890, 42.3 per cent; in 1900, 39.8 per cent, and in 1912, 19.5 per cent.

From 55.8 per cent of our total exportations in 1880 they had shrunk in 1912 to 19.5 per cent. During that same time manufactures exported had increased, as shown by the following figures: In 1880, 14.8 per cent of the total exportations; in 1890, 21.2 per cent of the total exportations; in 1900, 35.3 per cent of the total exportations, and in 1912, 47 per cent of the total exportations.

To summarize, from 1880 to 1912, the exportations of foodstuffs had decreased from 55.8 per cent to 19.5 per cent, while the exportations of manufactured products had increased from 14.8 per cent to 47 per cent.

Gentlemen, this indicates a great change in our economic conditions. It seems to me that when any manufacturer or any producer in the United States is able to send a large portion of his product abroad and compete in the markets of the world for the trade of the world that producer or manufacturer ought in reason to be able to hold his own in his own country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Of course no one wants to penalize a great manufacturer or a great producer because he exports his product. We glory in the increase of our exportations; but may we not with fairness say, "You, who by your skill and by your business sagacity can go into the markets of the earth and compete with all who meet you there, with their cheap labor, their cheap land, and all that, and compete successfully, we have an abiding conviction that you can compete in the markets of the United States without the bolstering-up process of the high protective tariff." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

And so the majority in making up this bill have given attention to the growth of our export trade and have noted the concerns and the industries that can and do export so much to the other nations of the world.

Of course the majority in making up this bill do not claim to be infallible. There may be valid criticism that can be urged against the pending measure. There may be mistakes that ought to be corrected, and I hope will be corrected; but the majority have tried to accomplish these things: First of all they have sought to bring about in this country by means of the tariff and tariff reductions honest and fair competition in the markets of America. [Applause on the Democratic side.] In providing our manufacturers and our producers all the opportunities and advantages they need to expand their business enterprises and grow great and wax prosperous we must not forget the debt we owe to the great consuming masses of this country. They are as much entitled to a competitive market in which to buy their goods as the manufacturer is entitled to a protected market in which to sell his goods. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And it appeared to us that those who wanted the protected market were a little too greatly favored in the past and too much consideration was given to their desires and to the things that would make for their welfare. We concluded to put in a stroke for the great mass of the American people who are doing the buying in this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

And so it is the aim of the majority to establish in this country a competitive market; competition from within and limited competition from without, in order that there may be the least possible danger of monopoly in any of the markets of the United States.

Second, the majority have tried to adjust the tariff rates so that sufficient money may be raised to pay the operating expenses of our Government. No one can tell just exactly what revenue will come from a tariff bill until it has been tried. We shall probably find that the customs duties will be decreased from $80,000,000 to $90,000,000 annually. We are making up that amount by the imposition of an income tax, so there may be provided a sufficient amount of money for the needs of the Government.

Third, an effort is made to give relief to our fellow citizens who have been crying out against the high cost of living. We have tried to make a tariff law not only for the advantage of the manufacturer and the producer, but for the benefit of the consumer as well.

I desire in the time I have remaining to call attention to certain of these schedules that have been attacked in the press and elsewhere. We passed a bill in the last Congress known as the farmers' free list, and in that bill we put flour on the free list. The work of that Congress was approved by the Democratic convention of Baltimore, and we feel that those things for which we stood prior to election we should stand for now after the election and the approval of them by the convention of our party. Therefore in making up this bill rye flour and buckwheat flour and wheat flour, with a limitation to which I shall hereafter refer, were placed on the free list.

We placed rye, out of which rye flour is made, upon the free list. There were reasons why that could be done. We received in the year 1912 a total revenue from rye of a little over $13,000, a small amount, and the total revenue from rye flour was less than $90. Now, there was no use of keeping either of these articles upon the dutiable list for the sake of the petty revenue produced, and therefore we placed both of them upon the free list.

From buckwheat flour we received a revenue of $211.05, and we received from buckwheat $3,025.36. There was no reason, from a revenue standpoint, why these articles should remain on the dutiable list, so they were put on the free list.

Now, when we come to wheat and wheat flour a different situation presents itself. And right here, in line with what I said a moment ago about exports, I would like to call attention to these significant figures. In 1900 the exports of wheat amounted to 102,000,000 bushels. In 1910 they amounted to 30,000,000 bushels, a decrease in 10 years in the exportation of this product from 102,000,000 bushels to 30,000,000 bushels. In 1910 the value of our exports of wheat was $47,806,598, and just two years later, in 1912, it was $28,477,584, a loss in the two years from 1910 to 1912 of over $19,000,000. To-day there is less than 4 per cent of our production of wheat exported from the United States. Now, for comparison, let me call your attention to the exports of wheat flour.

In 1910, when we exported better than $47,000,000 worth of wheat, we exported $47,621,467 worth of flour, but in 1912 the exports of wheat showed a loss of $19,329,014, while the exports of flour showed a gain of $3,378,330, the value of the exports of flour in 1912 being $50,999,797. Therefore we find wheat decreasing, so far as exportation is concerned, and flour increasing, indicating that the wheat of this country is being manufactured by the millers here and sold abroad, and our flour makers are able to grind the wheat, make the flour, transport it over the sea, invade the markets of the world, pay the tariff duties of foreign countries, and compete with the millers of the world. Fifty million dollars and over of the product exported in 1912! We find, too, there is a considerable revenue derived from wheat imported into this country under the rate of 25 cents a bushel.

There were imported 2,684,381 bushels in 1912, and the Treasury of this country was enriched by tariff duties assessed thereon to the amount of $352,245.46, more than a third of a million. During the same period from flour imported into this country we received in duties $166,444.52.

Mr. Chairman, in view of this situation we did not care to deprive the Treasury of revenue. We purposed to make a deep cut anyhow. Wheat was not put upon the free list, but retained upon the dutiable list with a duty of 10 cents a bushel, a cut of 60 per cent in the rate. We believed that if flour were placed upon the free list the millers, who are now able to sell $50,000,000 worth of their products in other countries, would be able to protect themselves here at home from foreign competition; but in order, as we thought, to silence any charge that we were indifferent to the welfare of the flour makers, we introduced in this bill two provisions favorable to the millers of the United States; first, the provision that wheat flour coming into this country from any country that imposed a duty upon American flour should bear a rate of duty of 10 per cent ad valorem, so the reduction on wheat is from the specific 25 cents to the specific 10 cents a bushel and on flour from the ad valorem 25 per cent to the ad valorem 10 per cent. Canada has a duty upon American flour of 60 cents a barrel. France has a duty upon American flour; Germany has a duty upon American flour. Nearly all of the European countries save England have duties on American flour, and wheat flour coming from any of those countries into the United States will pay a tariff rate of 10 per cent. But certain gentlemen say: "Do not you know that just the moment this bill becomes a law Canada, through her Governor General or some other official who has the power, with one stroke of the pen will strike out the duty now imposed on American flour, so that Canadian flour may come into the United States." No, Mr. Chairman, we do not know it, nor does any one else know it, but those acquainted with the history of recent tariff enactments have good reason to believe that Canada will do nothing of the kind.

We had here for consideration a reciprocity bill not very long ago, and we may as well admit in the house of its friends that Canada had about everything she wanted in that reciprocity pact. If there was anything that Canada desired that was not in there it was because Canada did not make known that fact to the United States authorities. Canada was willing that her wheat might come into this country free and that wheat from this country might go into Canada free, but, mark you, Canada was not willing that flour might go from the United States into Canada free of duty in return for free entry of her flour into the United States, but insisted on a rate of 50 cents a barrel. If we are to judge the present by the recent past, we have good reason to believe that Canada is very much averse to allowing American flour a free market in Canada for the sake of having Canadian flour come into the United States free of duty. When we think of the over 7,000 mills in this country making flour and the less than 700 in Canada, the name that American flour has not only here but wherever flour is sold, and the $50,000,000 of this product going out annually to other than American markets, we are apt to believe that the miller of Canada will hesitate a little while before he will ask to subject himself to the competition of the American miller who is conquering the world. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Second, we have changed the drawback clause. Heretofore the American miller might import wheat into this country and grind it and then upon exporting the flour obtain from the Treasury as a drawback not 99 per cent of all the duties he had paid, but 99 per cent of about 70 per cent of the duty he had paid, because 30 per cent of wheat is converted into wheat screenings, bran, and wheat offal and about 70 per cent of it is made into flour.

Upon the exportation of the flour under the law now proposed, with bran and wheat screenings upon the free list, the American miller can buy his wheat abroad, pay 10 cents a bushel upon it when it comes in here, grind it into flour, dispose of his screenings and bran wherever he pleases, and receive back upon the exportation of that flour 99 per cent of all the duty that he has paid. This means that the American miller can for export purposes bring into this country all the wheat he wants at a rate of 1 mill on the bushel. Has he very much reason to complain?

When we come to oatmeal and oats we find a situation somewhat like the flour and wheat situation. We collect in duties upon oatmeal and rolled oats $6,767, and we collect in duties upon oats $408,155.75, nearly half a million dollars. We did not feel justified in losing half a million dollars of revenue by putting oats upon the free list. We have a production of oatmeal and rolled oats in this country of greater value than $41,000,000. We export $376,000 worth of our production, and the total amount imported is only $40,000. We could not see the necessity, under these circumstances of sacrificing $408,000 worth of revenue, and so we put a duty of 10 cents a bushel upon oats.

Now, I desire to refer to one other matter, and then I am done, and that is the matter of print paper. In this bill we have permitted the entry of news print paper, valued at not more than 2½ cents a pound, free of duty. Under section 2 of the Canadian reciprocity act, which, although the act itself was not approved by the Dominion of Canada, became a law and is now in force, print paper for newspapers and books, worth not exceeding 4 cents per pound, is admitted free of duty if manufactured from wood or wood pulp subject to no export restriction.

Time will not permit me to dwell upon the methods employed by our Canadian friends to remove the restrictions and at the same time make sure that neither wood nor pulp would be exported from Canada into the United States. During the past year, out of 112,000,000 pounds of print paper imported into this country 64,000,000 pounds came in free of duty. We reduced the classification rate from 4 cents to 2½ cents. The paper that may come into this country free of duty under the proposed bill is paper which, I think, is never sold even at the mill at less than about $1.85. It is the cheapest kind of paper and used for newspapers. It is made principally of mechanically ground wood pulp, the cheapest kind of pulp made; but perhaps a fifth of the stock used in making such paper is chemical pulp, a pulp differently prepared and more expensive. Under section 2 of the reciprocity act wood pulp and chemical pulp, bleached and unbleached, may be admitted into the United States free of duty. If print paper up to 2½ cents per pound in value is to go upon the free list, it seems but fair and right that the pulp used in making this paper should go there too. That was done. Now, we felt that we were bound to take this step in reference to print paper. The Democratic convention at Denver five years ago adopted a platform in which there was this provision:

> Existing duties have given the manufacturers of paper a shelter behind which they have organized combinations to raise the price of pulp and of paper, thus imposing a tax upon the spread of knowledge. We demand the immediate repeal of the tariff on wood pulp, print paper, lumber, timber, and logs, and that those articles be placed upon the free list.

We have kept the promise that the party made to the people, but in doing it we have tried to do injury to no industry and to no person. We have determined to a nicety the limits within which news-print paper may be described and have put upon the free list the pulp from which it is made.

Gentlemen, there is some gratification and some satisfaction in the knowledge that amid all the storm of criticism which has come upon the bill and will come upon it, under the shadows of the fears that have been expressed as to its effect if enacted into law, it is generally admitted that the Democratic Party in the preparation of this measure has observed the pledges it made to the people of the United States, and that now in power it is doing the things that it advocated when it was not charged with the control of the Government. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman to yield back the balance of his time.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back six minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think that I have caught up with the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] yet, and I would like to yield on this side before he yields to another speaker on his. I would like to say to the gentleman from New York, in order to obviate any further trouble about yielding back time, that I suggest we agree when the time is not all consumed the Chair will not charge it to either of us.

Mr. PAYNE. I think that is a good suggestion.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PETERS].

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, the enactment of the tariff bill now under consideration in the House of Representatives will mark the end of the antiquated and discredited policy of high protection which has been in force, except for a brief period under the Wilson law, ever since the Civil War. The high rates of duty which were originally levied in 1862 and 1864 were intended to meet the extraordinary expenses of war times, and not only have they ceased to serve this purpose, but they have become a heavy burden on the community.

During the Civil War our industries were unable to supply the local demand, and the United States Treasury was in need of additional revenue. High-tariff rates were levied at that time not to lessen importations, not for protection, but because importations would continue in spite of the duty imposed. These rates were intended for revenue only, and not for protection to favored manufacturers.

But when the end of the war came the Republican Party realized that it had in its possession a valuable political asset, and Republican revisions upward occurred in 1875, 1890, 1897, and 1909 to the benefit of an influential minority of the people.

This trend upward received a slight check in 1883. In 1894 a genuine attempt was made to modify the tariff policy of this country. Unfortunately, the Wilson Tariff Act went into effect during the time of a great commercial depression which followed the financial and commercial crisis of 1893.

THE WILSON ACT.

The next presidential election was contested, not on the tariff grounds, but on other issues. At the time of the election of 1896 there had been no opportunity to fairly judge the effects of the Wilson law commercially and politically. The people of the country decided that campaign on issues entirely apart from those involved in the tariff discussion. The failure or success of the Wilson bill in the public mind was not the paramount issue of the campaign and received but little attention. The general depression had decreased both importations and internal revenue, and when the Republicans in 1897 revised the tariff they took advantage of the lack of public attention on the subject and of the opportunity which the need of greater revenue presented to draw a high-protective bill.

It is difficult to determine the effect of the Wilson Act. In speaking of the tariff act of 1894, Prof. F. W. Taussig, in his Tariff History of the United States, says (p. 319):

It (the Wilson Act) went into effect shortly after an acute commercial crisis, and in the worst stage of a period of depression. The crisis and the depression were due, in this case as in others, to a long and complex set of causes, some of them still obscure even to the best informed and most skilled observers. That the tariff act played any serious part in bringing them about would not be maintained by any cool and competent critic.

THE DINGLEY ACT.

The Dingley bill, which in 1897 repealed the Wilson Act, was the highest protective measure the country had yet seen, and as enacted the bill was practically a raise of about 10 per cent over the McKinley Act of 1890.

The Spanish War, following immediately after its passage, diverted public attention and presented new issues to the people, and a wave of great prosperity and industrial activity overswept the country. At this same time there also appeared a general increase in the prices of commodities. The high-protective tariff, in many instances prohibitive, had enabled the American manufacturers to combine and form monopolies and extort unusual prices from the American consumers. The issues of the Spanish War and commercial problems largely diverted public attention, with the result that the tariff entered little into the discussions of the presidential campaign of 1904.

THE PAYNE ACT.

The demand, however, for a lower tariff, which those in control of the Republican Party successfully struggled against, became more and more insistent until, in the platform of 1908, this demand was recognized, and a promise by the Republicans to revise the tariff was inserted. That this promise would not be carried out was freely predicted by the Democrats.

On the issue stated in their own platform to be "unequivocally" for tariff revision, which revision was explained by all the Republican speakers, including the candidate for President, to mean a revision downward, the Republicans were elected. A revision was undertaken, but in open defiance of the most solemn and specific pledges made to the people of this country the Republicans revised the tariff not downward, but upward.

CONGRESSIONAL ELECTION, 1910.

Faced with an ever-increasing cost of living and betrayed by the promise of the Republican Party to reduce the burdens of the tariff, the people turned to the Democratic Party. In 1910, one year after the passage of the Payne law, a Republican majority of 45 in the House was turned into a majority for the Democrats of 63. The rebuke which was administered to the high-tariff party is too well known for me to dwell on.

THE SIXTY-SECOND CONGRESS.

Intrusted with the responsibility of one of the two Houses of Congress, the Democratic Party showed promptly the sincerity of the pledges which it made to the people during the congressional election of 1910. Tariff bills placing many of the necessities of life on the free list and revising downward the tariff schedules on chemicals, metals, cotton, wool, and sugar passed this body by practically a unanimous Democratic vote, but were defeated either by a Republican Senate or by the veto of a Republican President.

These bills, though they failed to alter the law, are important in that they showed to the people of this country the intention of the Democrats to carry out the pledges which they made to revise the tariff downward. Our party reiterated its pledges to lower the tariff duties when it adopted its platform at the national convention at Baltimore.

The tariff plank in the Democratic platform of 1912 stated:

We favor the immediate downward revision of the existing high and, in many cases, prohibitive tariff duties, insisting that material reductions be speedily made upon the necessaries of life. Articles entering into competition with trust-controlled products and articles of American manufacture which are sold abroad more cheaply than at home should be put upon the free list.

THE UNDERWOOD BILL.

On this platform the Democratic Party received the indorsement of the Nation. A Democratic President was overwhelmingly elected; the Senate was made Democratic, and two-thirds of the membership of the House was chosen from the candidates of our party. Upon receiving this mandate from the people preparation was made at once to fulfill our promises. The Ways and Means Committee of the House, which, under the Constitution, originates all revenue measures for the Federal Government, went to work immediately upon the convening of Congress. Hearings were held and experts were consulted, and the committee applied itself to the preparation of the tariff bill now under consideration.

As a majority member of the Committee on Ways and Means which presents this bill, I can assure the House that the tariff has been revised not with the idea that the duties imposed were benefits to be given to favored industries, but that the tariff was a form of taxation which should be placed where its burden was least felt. On luxuries we placed as great a duty as possible without making them prohibitive; on the necessities of life we placed as low a duty as consistent with raising the revenues of the Government.

To the free list has been added many of the necessities of the table and of the home. The placing of meat and fish and many vegetables on the free list and the reduction in wool and cotton clothing and in many other articles will lighten the burdensome cost of living for every citizen.

That this bill introduces a material modification of the economic policy of our Government is not questioned. It is a change in the interest of the consumer.

The following table is instructive in this connection. It gives the average rates of duty for each tariff schedule under the Payne Act and the estimated rates of duty for the Underwood bill, and also shows the percentage of change in the average duties which we propose to make.

Comparative summary of average ad valorem rates of duty by schedules.

Schedule.	Average rate of duty.		Reduction in per cent of duty.

BUSINESS AND THE TARIFF.

The greatest benefit to the greatest number has been the controlling basis for the changes summarized in the above table. At the same time the committee has not been unmindful of that provision in the National Democratic platform adopted at the Baltimore convention, which stated that our system of tariff taxation is intimately connected with the business of the country and that we favored the ultimate attainment of the principles which we advocate by legislation which will not injure or destroy legitimate industry. Business is too much dovetailed and labor too immobile to justify too sweeping a reduction of the tariff, which, while it would ultimately be a benefit, would in its immediate effect bear so grievously on a minority as to cause inexcusable hardship.

On the other hand, the committee has realized that "business" is sometimes guilty of going on what may be called a "sympathetic strike." The Ways and Means Committee has made every effort to get at the facts, and we believe that we are offering a tariff bill which is economically sound, a bill which takes from the minority the discriminatory advantages which they have enjoyed but have not shared, and which gives to the majority its fair proportion of the benefits of our American markets and industries.

IMPORTANT ITEMS IN THE BILL.

It is not possible to enter into a discussion of the specific benefits which will accrue to the manufacturer and consumer when the rates in the new bill go into effect. Coal, lumber, and structural steel, however, may be mentioned. These items are used by all. The manufacturer needs lumber and steel to construct his factories, and coal for power; the workingman needs building material for his house, and fuel is absolutely essential.

COAL.

Bituminous coal has carried under the Payne law a rate of 45 cents a ton, or, reduced to an ad valorem equivalent, 13.66 per cent. In the Underwood bill all coal is free. Last year there were importations of 868,181 tons of coal, all of which paid this rate of 45 cents. Coal in this bill is free, and our eastern markets should receive cheaper coal through competition with the mines of Canada.

LUMBER.

Sawed boards, planks, laths, shingles, and other sawed lumber, which under the Payne law carry an average duty of 8.63 per cent, are free in the penning bill. The value of importations of these materials was $19,757,000 for 1912, on which $1,705,000 duties were paid. The proposed change should lessen the cost of the construction of the home and the factory.

STRUCTURAL STEEL.

Structural steel, which is used so extensively in building our office buildings and factories, the duties on which have increased the cost of construction in this country, has been reduced from the present rate of 23.20 per cent to 12 per cent.

WOOL MANUFACTURES.

The reductions in the tariff on wool manufactures, it is said, will destroy that industry. This prophecy is, of course, not true. Up to the present time this industry has been the beneficiary of a prohibitive tariff, and naturally a reduction of that tariff to a competitive basis will force a readjustment which will place the industry ultimately on a sounder economic basis and free it from the uncertainties of legislation. Destruction will not follow the enactment of the new Democratic law.

The new bill has many substantial concessions in favor of the wool manufacturer. Annually this industry uses about $14,000,000 worth of chemicals and dyestuffs. The Underwood bill either places on the free list or reduces the rate of duty upon the following articles: Acetic acid, bichromate of potash, hyposulphite of soda, carbonate of soda (crystal), logwood extract, and sulphuric acid.

The most important concession, however, in the law to the wool manufacturers is free wool. For years they have carried a burden of 45 to 50 per cent upon their chief raw material. It has tied up annually thousands of dollars and so increased their cost of production that they have been excluded from foreign markets, where they would be forced to compete with their foreign rivals, who have free raw wool. Under the rates of the Underwood bill all the wools of the world—those from Australasia and Argentina especially—will be accessible to them, and they will be able to buy their chief raw material at the same price as their French, German, and English competitors.

Manufacturers at the time of a tariff reduction bring many imaginary ills upon themselves. Wool manufacturers do it in particular. They have gotten so in the habit of looking to legislation for support that they have convinced themselves that their industrial existence depends upon it. Reduction in the tariff is to them destruction. The fact of the matter is, wool manufactures in this country are the result, not of the tariff, but of the skill and initiative of the American business man. The tariff has and will continue to assist him, but at best it is a negative factor. Without the aggressiveness and courage of the leaders in the industry, nothing could build up industry. Manufacturers are in a mental attitude toward the tariff from which they must be freed. In the past a suggestion of a reduction in the tariff has created a mental panic; in many cases the manufacturer gives up without trying to face the new conditions caused by tariff changes. In the majority of cases individual effort and determination could overcome the threatened danger, and the domestic industry would be stronger for the struggle. In 1894 and 1895, even when the tariff changes were accompanied by a depression caused by bad crops and other factors beyond the control of legislation, those wool manufacturers who stayed with their mills were able to compete with the foreigner and make money. It was those who gave up in despair without a fight who were said to have failed. The success of the wool industry under the Underwood rates depends very largely upon the attitude of the manufacturer himself.

COTTON MANUFACTURES.

The cotton industry has also benefited by the reduction in the tariff on chemicals and dyestuffs. This industry uses approximately $5,000,000 worth of these materials annually. They include acetic and tannic acids, caustic soda, chloride of lime, and vegetable dyes. It is well known that the American cotton mills, because of cheap cotton and the automatic loom, can produce the coarse cotton goods as cheaply as any other mills in the world. Still a duty is placed upon similar goods by the Underwood bill imported into the United States, and this duty increases with the fineness of the goods in recognition of the disadvantage under which the American producer of fine goods labors compared with the producers of the coarser grades.

THE BOOT AND SHOE INDUSTRY.

The Underwood bill places boots and shoes upon the free list. At the same time it puts practically all the materials entering into boots and shoes on the free list. Among these materials are hides and sole, patent, and upper leather. The duty on tannic acid has been reduced from 25 cents to 4 cents per pound. There has also been a decided reduction in the duty on all the minor materials used by this industry.

The American boot and shoe industry has no equal in the world. It can compete successfully in foreign markets with the foreign producer.

The duty on shoes is at present of little assistance to the industry. The reductions contemplated in this bill on the materials used in the manufacture of shoes will lessen their cost and aid the manufacturer to compete more advantageously in foreign markets.

Following is a table showing some of the materials which enter into the cost of making shoes on which there will be a material reduction in the rate of duty:

COST OF LIVING.

"Massachusetts," says the report on the cost of living of that State in 1910, "comes far from feeding itself. In consequence of our extremely small percentage of agricultural workers and the excess of population in proportion to available farm land, the State is mainly dependent on outside sources for its food supply." Without doubt the removal or reduction of the duty on foodstuffs will bring added prosperity to the people of Massachusetts, and especially to those living in a large city like Boston. The Underwood bill proposes to remove many of the restrictions upon the importation of the necessities of life, which are now practically inaccessible to the New England States. Upon the enactment of the Underwood bill factory centers will be able to draw from Canada and other foreign countries for their food supply.

The high cost of living is probably the chief cause that led the people to demand a general revision of the tariff. Consumption in the United States is rapidly overtaking production, and the importation of foodstuffs will soon be a necessity. It is therefore the duty of the Democratic Party to do all that it can to relieve the consumer, and as a result sharp reductions have been made in the necessities of life.

MEATS.

The Underwood bill has placed on the free list bacon, hams, fresh beef, veal, mutton, lamb, and pork. Under the present law the duty on bacon and ham is 4 cents per pound, and on the fresh meats 16 per cent. This reduction will be of decided advantage to the consumer. The importance of the United States as an exporter of meats is growing less and less each year, and the amount exported is insignificant in comparison with home consumption. Argentina and Australasia are the important meat-exporting countries, and the United States can not expect to compete with them in the European markets. On the contrary, national prosperity demands that we take advantage of this supply. The importation of beef and mutton from these countries has in the past been comparatively small, but with the removal of the duty it will undoubtedly increase, and there will be a lowering of the price.

The reduction of the duty on cattle from approximately 27 per cent to 10 per cent will open to the cattle feeders of the Middle West the range cattle, known as "feeders," from Mexico, and ultimately this will have a tendency to lower the price of meat.

The duty on poultry when dead has been reduced in the Underwood bill from 5 cents to 2 cents per pound, and poultry when alive from 3 cents to 1 cent per pound. Fish have been placed on the free list. These facts should appreciably lower the price of these articles in the Boston market.

DAIRY PRODUCTS AND VEGETABLES.

Among the articles placed upon the free list by the Underwood bill are cream, milk, and potatoes. And the duty has been cut in two on butter, cheese, and eggs. The duties on vegetables, berries, and fruits have also been reduced. It is upon such products as these that the tariff operates directly, and freer trade in them with Canada must mean a benefit to the consumer in the eastern cities. It will enable the eastern markets to avail themselves of seasonable advantages and to purchase the vegetables and small fruits which mature late in Canada, and an appreciable decline in price may be expected on turnips and potatoes.

The duty on hay has been reduced by the Underwood bill from $4 to $2 per ton. Dairy farmers in Massachusetts do not raise all the hay that they need, and this factor in the law will make it possible to buy hay from Canada, rather than from the Western States, and thus save a large part of the freight.

FLOUR.

The United States is rapidly approaching a point where it will not produce enough wheat to supply the needs of the people. Naturally the first place to which we will turn to make up any deficit will be Canada. Recognizing this condition of affairs the Underwood bill has reduced the duty on wheat and placed flour on the free list.

NECESSITIES REDUCED.

Many other products might be mentioned upon which the Underwood bill either reduces the duty or places on the free list. The chief ones are enumerated in a following table. The duty on sugar has been reduced, and in three years it will go on the free list. This will mean an immediate reduction in the price of this commodity.

The immediate effect of the tariff upon prices is a question upon which many men differ. While admitting that it is a complex subject, it can be said that the benefits of tariff reductions on food products are likely to appear more quickly than on other products. No one will accuse the Massachusetts Cost of Living Commission of 1910 with believing that all our ills could be solved by the removal of the tariff, yet it said:

Its (the removal of the tariff) importance comes from the fact that we are soon going to buy a material part of our food outside our own limits. It would further have the very beneficial consequence of removing what chance may now exist to "corner" food products—a chance that puts the public at the mercy of the speculator and the trust. To some extent, also, it would lessen our dependence on the seasons and the weather. Bad harvests rarely occur over all the world.

This same commission summed up in its report the principle which has guided the Democrats in framing the Underwood bill. It says:

We submit, therefore, that it is a wise economic policy to give the people free access to those articles of food that call for the bulk of the expenditure of the masses. For purpose of revenue it may be wise to tax somewhat the comforts, and the heaviest duties should be levied on the luxuries, but the food necessities of life should be "free."

A table showing the reduction in duties on the necessities of life follows. The reductions are material ones, and will greatly benefit the consumer.

LABOR.

A world-wide market for food will prevent monopoly. Cornering the market will be out of the question, and that the wage earner will benefit by being able to buy his supplies in an open market is indisputable. Moreover, the opening of our ports to an increased supply of free raw materials will enable our manufacturers to expand our export trade. This will mean an increased demand for labor.

The wage earners of this country are to receive a further advantage under the provisions of this bill. Not only have import duties been lowered on the necessities of life and monopolies prevented, but the burdens of taxation have been more equitably distributed.

THE INCOME TAX.

A tax is to be levied on the incomes of those who demand the greatest assistance from the Government in protecting their property and who are most favorably situated to meet this expense. This tax will be levied on all who have an income in excess of $4,000 and will replace the revenue now obtained by taxes on the necessities of life. The present import duties on sugar, breadstuffs, meats, and dairy products amount each year to about $60,000,000. As shown by the table above, practically all of these necessities have been placed on the free list or reduced by a large margin. The $60,000,000 now obtained by a tax on food, which constitutes the greater proportion of the expenditures of those of modest means will, under the provisions of our bill, be raised by an income tax instead.

CUSTOMS ADMINISTRATIVE FEATURES.

The committee has not been content merely to change the provisions of the bill which now impose inequitable taxes. We have gone further, with a view to improving the effectiveness of the administration of the customs laws.

Numerous frauds have been brought to light of late which confirm the general opinion that our import duties are not properly executed. The Ways and Means Committee have taken into consideration the changed conditions which the expansion of our commercial relations has brought about. The administrative features of the bill have been so modified as to make it possible to collect the duties imposed by law. The powers of the customs officials to get at the facts with regard to prices and values of articles of foreign manufacture have been materially increased for this purpose.

These changes are too technical, for the most part, to be taken up here in detail, but I wish to point out one of the important additions which we propose to make in this bill which will reduce fraud by undervaluation to a minimum.

THE "ANTIDUMPING" PROVISION.

The paragraph covering this provision is called the "antidumping" clause, and stipulates that whenever articles are exported to the United States of a class or kind produced here, if the actual selling price to the American importer is less than the fair market value of the same article when sold for home consumption in the exporting country, there shall be levied, in addition to the usual duties, a special, or "dumping," duty of 15 per cent on the difference between the normal market value and the price at which it was sold for exportation. This dumping duty is to apply, whenever there is occasion, to all goods on which there is less than a 50 per cent rate.

Inasmuch as the regular duties are levied on the selling, or invoice price, it has been difficult to detect fraud by undervaluation, although the local market price of the exporting country was well known to our consular service and customs collectors. The dumping duty will serve as an automatic check against fraud, in that importers will find it to their disadvantage to place a value on merchandise which is below its fair market value, for this practice would at once place them under suspicion in case of deliberate undervaluation, or subject them to a surtax of 15 per cent in case goods were being dumped on our market.

Another feature of this new provision is that there will be increased stability in prices. The dumping duty will discourage foreign countries from unloading a large temporary surplus on our markets, which tends for a period to disturb prices and to unsettle business. Obviously this provision will be a great benefit to the American producer.

An indirect benefit, and a very important one, which arises from increased uniformity in prices and the absence of unnatural fluctuation in market values is that the revenue of the Government will be more dependable and more accurately estimated. This tariff bill has been drawn on a revenue basis. We wish to make sure that there will be sufficient funds available to run the Government. On the other hand, we do not wish an unwarranted surplus, which means excessive taxation. In order to determine with any exactness the amount of revenue to be expected from the different tariff schedules, we must have a definite basis for our calculations. The market values of articles in the country from whence exported are easy to ascertain, and will afford the assistance which is so essential to a satisfactory administration of our customs laws.

The dumping provision has been in effect in Canada since 1907 in practically the same form as proposed in the committee's bill. We have every assurance that it has been successfully used there; and inasmuch as Canada is one of our nearest competitors, it behooves us to take a like action to insure us against discrimination.

NEW INDUSTRIAL ERA.

There comes a time in the industrial development of every country when its manufacturers must turn their attention to the conquest of world markets. In the United States we have had up to the present time a vast domestic market, which has grown relatively less and less in comparison with our expanding industries. Production is rapidly overtaking consumption, and thoughtful manufacturers realize that unless they increase our export trade the domestic market will soon mark the limits of their development. Industrially, we have progressed to a point where such tariff rates as are embodied in the Payne-Aldrich law cease to encourage industry, but impede and arrest it. Blind to the changes which have taken place in our industrial life during the last decade, the Republicans have stubbornly adhered to a worn-out and obsolete system of exclusion and are now relying upon the prejudices of the people to defeat the careful reforms of the Democratic Party.

The sweeping victory of the party last November was not only a demand to revise the tariff in the interests of the consumer, it was a demand to revise it in the interests of the industrial classes and the manufacturer as well. At that time the Nation turned its back on the policy of national exclusiveness and faced the world in contest for industrial and commercial supremacy. If our manufactures are to expand, if the facilities of the Panama Canal and the unlimited opportunities of the markets of South America and the Orient are to be availed of, the barriers which hold the manufacturers of the Nation back must be removed; artificiality in industry must be eliminated, and the manufacturer must learn to face foreign competition at home so that he may successfully meet it in neutral markets abroad. Our permanent industrial strength lies in the reduction of the tariff.

CONCLUSION.

The consumer above all others will be benefited by the enactment of the new tariff law. He has faced during the past decade a rising cost of living, which is in large part due to the prohibitive tariff of the Republican Party. The Democratic Party does not claim that the downward revision of the tariff is a panacea for all our social and economic ills, but it does claim that in so far as the tariff, either actually or potentially, burdens the consumer, it should be changed, and the lowering of tariff duties is the principal need of the day. The time has come in our national development not only when our manufactured goods must seek markets abroad, but when the consumer must import from abroad a part of his foodstuffs. Trade is reciprocal. We can not expect to sell abroad if we do not buy abroad. Freer trade in food and raw materials means industrial strength and relief to the consumer. It is thus that the producer and consumer stand together, the beneficiaries of the new era in American tariff legislation.

The Democratic Party proposes with the enactment of the new tariff bill to remove present discriminations in the law, to encourage increased expansion in our export trade, to provide for a more stable and economic basis for our business interests, and by a change in the rates of duty and through the medium of an income tax and better provisions for the administration of our tariff laws to more equitably distribute the burdens of taxation. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I believe that when this bill is enacted and industry has adjusted itself to it the tariff will be out of politics and there will ensue a period of unprecedented industrial activity in this country.

This is the people's tariff bill. It marks a new era in the social and industrial development of our great country.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PETERS. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. In reference to subsection 7 of paragraph J of section 4, do I understand that makes a reduction of 5 per cent in the rate of duties imposed in the bill on goods which are imported in American bottoms?

Mr. PETERS. Yes; it does.

Mr. MANN. Does that mean that on all goods which are imported in American bottoms the tariff rate will be 95 per cent of the rate fixed in the bill?

Mr. PETERS. No.

Mr. MANN. I am not playing upon words. Of course, if there is a reduction of 5 per cent, that leaves 95 per cent, as I understand it, and 95 per cent will be the amount to be paid.

Mr. PETERS. No; the regular duties will be paid, and there is to be a rebate from those duties of 5 per cent to the importer.

Mr. MANN. Would the gentleman read the paragraph and see what it says?

Mr. PETERS. Will the gentleman give the page?

Mr. MANN. Well, I do not remember the page.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman from Illinois will allow me to answer the question I will be glad to do so.

Mr. MANN. Certainly; I want to get the information.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There is a rebate allowed of 5 per cent on the duties collected at the customhouse from any goods coming in an American vessel. Now, to illustrate, it brings it to a very simple proposition. If there is a ship which comes in and the importer gets goods from the customhouse, the duties on which amount to $1,000, there will be a discount of 5 per cent, which means $50 will be taken off, and he will pay the customhouse tax of $950.

Mr. MANN. That is what I understood; it is a discount, not a rebate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; it is a discount.

Mr. MANN. Now, a further question I wish to ask the gentleman is, What effect will that have upon subsection 1 of paragraph J, which imposes a duty of 10 per cent discriminatory against all vessels which brings goods in paying the same rate of duty as vessels of the United States?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman misinterprets the two sections. They are not involved at all. Subsection 7 of paragraph J gives a discount on goods coming into this country. Subsection 1 is a reenactment of the present law and has been a reenactment of the present law for many years.

Mr. MANN. I understand that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I admit the language of it is considerably involved, but it was not changed because it has been construed by the courts, and we left it alone.

Mr. MANN. I am very sure the gentleman will, if he reexamines that carefully, because he will find reason for changing it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not at all, because the gentleman does not realize the purpose of the two sections.

Mr. MANN. I do realize the purpose of the two sections.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If he does, the gentleman readily sees there is no conflict between them at all, because section 1 is to be applicable when a country discriminates against our ships going into their ports and has nothing whatever to do with goods coming from other ports into our ports. It is for an entirely different purpose, but when we reach that section I will be glad to explain it further.

Mr. MANN. I will call attention to it, and I hope the gentleman will be here to explain it then if I have an opportunity to address the House.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. PETERS. Certainly.

Mr. AUSTIN. Is it the opinion of the Member from Massachusetts that the placing of boots and shoes upon the free list will help the New England boot and shoe industry?

Mr. PETERS. I think the boot and shoe industry under the provisions of this bill receives very great and substantial advantages.

Mr. AUSTIN. Then it will be a benefit rather than a detriment to the boot and shoe business in Massachusetts to put boots and shoes on the free list?

Mr. PETERS. I believe the provisions of this bill are a great advantage to the boot and shoe industry of the United States.

Mr. AUSTIN. I am asking a specific and direct question, and the gentleman should give a specific and direct answer.

Mr. PETERS. I am giving a specific and direct answer, and if the gentleman does not like my answer that is not my fault. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. AUSTIN. I will ask the gentleman another question. He speaks about securing free coal under the operations of this bill. Does that mean Massachusetts will secure its coal supply from Newfoundland or continue to buy coal from West Virginia?

Mr. PETERS. The gentleman realizes that it depends upon the market price at the point to be delivered. I suppose some of the coal will be brought down from the Nova Scotia Peninsula or else the rate from Tennessee be lowered.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY].

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, if I could name this bill I would change its title so it would read "A bill to lower wages, to close factories, to spread disaster broadcast in the United States, and build up industries abroad." [Applause on the Republican side.] I believe the bill if enacted will bring about those results.

I am sorry to be called upon at this time to defend the protective policy of the Republican Party which in the past has brought the greatest measure of prosperity to the American people they have ever enjoyed since the beginning of the Republic.

Experience of the past brings me to believe the rates of duty provided for in this bill, if enacted into law in their present form, will not bring the people of this country the relief which its friends predict, but will have a very opposite effect.

Nineteen years ago the Democratic Party, then having control of both branches of Congress and the Executive, presented a bill in general terms and principles remarkably similar to this bill. It was known as the Wilson-Gorman bill and was enacted into law, and the results which followed are well known to that portion of our population who were then of age. The authors of that bill predicted that with its passage great happiness and prosperity would come to the people of the United States. They claimed values to the consumers would be lowered; that increased employment would be given to our labor; that an increased demand for labor would increase wages; and that increased wages would reflect prosperity upon the whole land; that the laboring man would be able to purchase more of the necessities of life for his daily wage, and that, although prices would be lowered to the consumers, no producers thereby would be injured. At that time prominent Republicans opposed that measure most vigorously and urged, as Republicans urge now, that inadequate tariff rates on American-made products would flood our markets with foreign goods produced by foreign cheap labor, and that increased importations would curtail home production and employment of American labor and result in hard times. Whose contention was right then? It is all a matter of record, and I beg of you not to close your eyes to it.

It will be remembered that in 1892 the people of this country were prosperous. The crops were never more bountiful than during that year. The factories never ran more at full time than then. Labor demanded the highest scale of wages that had ever been paid in the factories or on the farms of the United States, and prosperity was everywhere to be found in this country. By just such misrepresentations by politicians from the platform and through yellow journals and magazines as have been so much in evidence of late the seed of discontent was sown until the people believed they should have a change. A change was made and was made at a time when our fields of golden grain throughout the land were most bountiful. Our factories were running full blast, labor was receiving remunerative wages, capital realized fair to extraordinary returns for investments, our banks were well filled, and our mines never more productive.

The change was made, it came upon us quickly, for almost in the passing of a night and the twinkling of an eye something caused a halt; property values shrunk more than one-half; factories closed down or ran on short time; fires were extinguished in our smelting furnaces; bank failures occurred daily in every State in the Union, and $2,000,000,000 worth of railroad property went in the hands of receivers; laboring men were dressed in rags and tramping the country far and wide seeking employment; poverty and suffering existed in humble homes, and Coxey's armies marched toward the Capital. The change transformed a land of sunshine and plenty into one of destitution and discontent. What was the cause? Can any intelligent man attribute all this disaster to other than that Democratic tariff law, which opened wide the gates of that wall of protection which had been built about the Nation by the Republican Party? Under that Democratic measure the products of foreign countries, produced by the cheapest labor in the world, flooded our markets, and, due to idleness, the purchasing power of the great masses of our people was either cut in two or completely destroyed. Can any honest man say, in a firm belief, any other cause than this Democratic tariff law occasioned all this distress? Identically the same policies and the same theories of that tariff law are set forth in the present bill. Can any man point out any difference between the two, except that the Wilson-Gorman tariff bill provided for higher rates of duty than does this bill?

At the time of the consideration of the Wilson-Gorman bill the free-wool era had just been ushered in by just such rainbow prophecies of the glorious results that would follow as have been heard from the champions of the present bill. On one of these occasions Hon. William M. Springer, of Illinois, said:

Pass this bill and thousands of feet heretofore bare and thousands of limbs, naked or covered with rags, will be clothed with suitable garments, and the condition of all the people will be improved. It will give employment to 50,000 more operators in the woolen mills; it will increase the demand for wool, and prices will increase; and with increased demand for labor wages will increase. Those who favor its passage may be assured that they have done something to scatter plenty o'er a smiling land.

In a way the buoyant prophecies of this gifted statesman were realized. Plenty was scattered o'er a smiling land, but not America—it was England. Before this Democratic experiment in tariff for revenue only had been in operation six months the woolen mills of England were working overtime and bread lines and soup houses and other forms of public charities were supporting the idle operators of the American woolen mills. It had the result of distributing plenty to the people of a smiling land across the sea—the opposite effect to that predicted by this illustrious statesman.

William Jennings Bryan, on the floor of the House, on January 13, 1894, said:

Speaking for myself it is immaterial, in my judgment, whether the sheep grower receives any benefit from the tariff or not. Whether he does or does not, I am for free wool in order that our woolen manufacturers, unburdened by a tax upon foreign wool and unburdened by a like tax upon home-grown wool, may manufacture for a wider market.

Under the legislation advocated by Mr. Bryan, a measure not very different from the one now under consideration, the American manufacturers with free wool lost one-half of the American market and sold in foreign markets in such small proportions that it did not faze the plenty and prosperity that was scattered o'er the smiling land of England and all Europe, for while the woolen manufacturers were greatly depressed in this country they prospered as never before on the other side of the Atlantic, where the Wilson-Gorman law had bestowed a gift of many millions of dollars worth of American business to exultant English manufacturers. Helmuth Schwartz & Co.'s annual report for 1895 declared:

The dominant factor in the past 12 months has been the recovery and rapid development of export trade of wool and woolens to the United States under the stimulating influence of free wool and lower tariff rates on woolen goods.

That year—1895—thanks to Mr. Bryan and other gentlemen who enacted the Wilson-Gorman tariff law, was described as "the most prosperous, judging by the volume of exports, that the English manufacturers of woolens had enjoyed since 1890." This beneficent Democratic tariff law endowed many an English woolen manufacturer with the means of adequately supporting the honors of knighthood granted by a grateful sovereign.

The gleeful Bradford Journal, in its annual review of the English woolen trade for 1895, spoke of the year as the most extraordinary of the waning century and attributed the great prosperity to the more reasonable tariff adopted by the United States.

The London Times joined in the chorus of rejoicers and said:

There is room for doubt whether outside the West Riding of Yorkshire it is at all generally realized that the year 1895 witnessed a revival of the worsted industry of such magnitude as to be a matter not only for local but for national congratulation. After long years of depression, the varying, sometimes doubtless, intermitted gloom, which had lately become painfully intense, the great manufacturing district of which Bradford is the center, was visited last year by the full sunshine of prosperity.

All of which the London Times proceeded to attribute, roughly speaking, to the Wilson tariff, which came into effective operation in the last months of 1894 in place of the "strangling system of duties" associated with the name of McKinley.

There was your smiling land. There was the bountiful and the plenty.

My friends, I will, in the time given to me, try to touch the high spots in a few of the schedules on which you have been working so industriously with your pruning knife. I will take up the things in which the people I have the honor to represent directly, in the eighth district of Michigan, are most interested. You propose, as the Irishman did with his dog, to take a little bit off of the sugar schedule at a time, so that it will not hurt so much.

That is the way the Irishman cut his dog's ears. He cut a little from them every day, so that it would not punish the dog so much. You propose by this bill to put sugar on the free list at the end of three years, and at the present time to lower the duty a little over 25 per cent below the duty now provided for by law. There has not been one scintilla of evidence presented to the Committee on Ways and Means in their hearings before they began the fixing of rates in this bill; there was not one scintilla of evidence presented to the Hardwick Sugar Investigating Committee from any source, except the Sugar Trusts and two canning companies, asking for a lower rate of duty on sugar. None at all. One Frank C. Lowry is very much in evidence in the handbook printed by our Democratic friends, members of the Ways and Means Committee. Who is Frank C. Lowry? He is the paid lobbyist of the sugar refining companies of New York and the sales agent for the Federal Sugar Co., of which Mr. August Spreckels is the president. He claims to be the secretary of a wholesale grocerymen's association, and when before the Hardwick committee, and when before the Committee on Ways and Means in January last, Mr. Lowry admitted under oath there had never been a meeting of more than himself and one other member of that wholesale grocerymen's association, which is advocating free sugar, and such meetings were held when he, Mr. Lowry, called upon the grocerymen, who permitted him to use their names. He further admitted there never was any weekly, monthly, semiannual, or annual dues paid by any member of the association. They never had a meeting. There was no organization whatever, but he, Mr. Lowry, had received many thousands of dollars from this Mr. Spreckels, president of the Federal Sugar Co., to send broadcast over this land as coming from this association literature asking Members of Congress to vote for free trade on sugar.

Who is Mr. Spreckels, and what firm does he represent? There are many of the Spreckels family, all estimable gentlemen. I disagree with them in their political views; that is all. Mr. August Spreckels, if I am right, is president of the Federal Sugar Refining Co. of New York. Mr. Lowry, his representative, testified before the Hardwick investigating committee that of the $10,000,000 of stock issued by that company only about $3,200,000 had been paid in cash, and all the balance of the $10,000,000 of stock was watered stock.

I asked him if the pump had not been kept going industriously when they ground out that stock. [Laughter.] He made the statement—and perhaps the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] will attempt to answer this point, too—Mr. Lowry made the statement or complaint that a certain firm in the State of Michigan had a very large amount of common stock, and because of his complaint of that amount of common stock the interesting fact was brought out concerning the common stock in his own company.

He stated that two-thirds of the stock issued to the Michigan Sugar Co. was common stock and therefore watered stock. This statement is incorrect. The Michigan Sugar Co., when organized, purchased eight sugar factories in the State of Michigan, two of which have been dismantled and moved to another part of the country, and the new capital put in by the new organization represents the preferred stock, and all the capital invested in all those factories when they were first built represents the common stock, or the most of it, at least. One million or a million and a half out of some ten or twelve million dollars' capital is the only amount of watered stock in the concern, as I remember the testimony, and the testimony presented to the Hardwick committee bears out that statement.

There are in the State of Michigan to-day 16 sugar factories, representing an investment in plants and working capital of nearly $20,000,000. There are 32,000 farmers in the State of Michigan raising sugar beets, among whom those factories last year distributed $8,000,000 for the purchase of beets. Those factories pay in freight to the railroads of Michigan nearly $2,000,000 per year. They turn out from $12,000,000 to $15,000,000 worth of finished product—granulated sugar—each year. The people of that State consume about one-half of that sugar.

Heretofore, before those factories were built, we exported that money to some foreign country and furnished employment to foreigners to produce the sugar which we in the State of Michigan consumed. To-day we are not only producing all the sugar we consume, and therefore keeping the money at home, but we are making and exporting from the State to other States from $6,000,000 to $8,000,000 worth of sugar each year.

There are located in the United States over 70 beet-sugar factories making granulated sugar. I believe but one out of the whole number produces raw sugar—a factory in California, owned, I believe, by the Spreckels. And, by the way, before I get away from the Spreckels, who are so industrious, and before I get away from Mr. Lowry, whose handwriting is clearly seen all through the sugar schedule of this bill, for it is evident our Democratic friends have listened attentively to Mr. Lowry and the Spreckels family in writing the tariff schedule on sugar, I want to say that there is another Mr. Spreckels in San Francisco, who was a most ardent supporter, personally and financially, so I am informed, of President Wilson last year. There is no discredit in that, but if newspaper reports are correct this Mr. Rudolph Spreckels, who lives on the Pacific coast, is now slated for appointment as minister to Germany. And between August Spreckels, of New York, and Rudolph Spreckels, of San Francisco, God help the sugar industry in the middle. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

The beet-sugar crop comes on the market generally in the fall, in October, and goes off the market in May, and during the time when the domestic product is on the market the lowest price of sugar exists that can be found in the land at any time of the year. Why? Because beet sugar is sold in nearly every State in the Union, and is sold at a lower price than refined sugar made from cane; not because it is not equal in quality, but because of the keen competition between those seventy-odd beet-sugar factories in this country. The price of sugar is brought down to a minimum to the consumer, and the very instant our domestic sugar goes off the market up goes the price of sugar in New York.

There never has been a time in the history of this land, except once, when sugar was as low as it is to-day. That time was when the McKinley law was in effect. Sugar was then upon the free list, and, in order to protect the domestic industry, a bounty of 2 cents a pound was paid by the Federal Government. At no other time in our history has the price of sugar been as low to the consumer as it is to-day.

Mr. Lowry, who evidently aided so much in the preparation of this bill, made the statement under oath to the committee that in this country refined sugar was always sold at the lowest price in the city of New York. A gentleman from Michigan engaged in the beet-sugar industry followed him, and his testimony under oath was most convincing evidence in support of adequate protection to the home industry, and showed the utter falsity of Mr. Lowry's statement. In part it is as follows:

I venture to say here, and I will give specific illustrations of the truth of my statements, that there was not a minute between the 10th day of October, 1912, and the 1st day of January, 1913, when the cost of domestic sugar delivered at any point in the United States, from the Mississippi River to the Allegheny Mountains, and between the Ohio River and the Canadian boundary, was not less than the quotation in New York. The highest price of sugar in the territory mentioned would be the price in the Twin Cities, Minneapolis and St. Paul, where the rate of freight is 30 cents. The maximum base price of beet sugar in the time indicated was 4.50; add 30 cents freight to it and you get a quotation of 4.80 in the Twin Cities, whereas the quotation in New York itself was 4.90. A few days after this, open 4.50 quotations went into effect, the price of domestic beet sugar in the Twin Cities and throughout that section of the country where the freight rate is highest, declined to a 4.35 basis, and add 30 cents to that and you get 4.65, the delivered price.

Take it in the city of Chicago. The city of Chicago has been buying beet sugar during this interval at a base price as low as 4.20, whereas the cash price in New York, with the exception of one or two refiners who cut it 5 points, has been, during that period, 4.90. The delivered price of beet sugar in the city of Chicago has been as low as 4.42½, and I know some sales that were made at 4.40, delivered in Chicago, whereas the price of cane sugar in New York was 4.90. You take, for instance, Cincinnati. The prevailing price for beet sugar in Cincinnati during this time had been 4.40 plus 19½ cents for the delivered price, and that makes 4.58½ cents, the delivered price in Cincinnati, as against 4.90 in New York.

Now we will take the city of Detroit: 4.40 plus 17½ cents makes 4.57½ cents in Detroit as against 4.90 in New York. I say, gentlemen, that the delivered price of beet sugar in the United States between the dates indicated—when the beet crop came on the market and the 1st day of January—and in the territory described has been below the price of cane sugar in New York, thus controverting the statement that has been made here that the price of sugar in New York, under the eaves of the refineries, is the lowest price of sugar in the United States. I have given the distinct statement here and the quotations are before me. The proof is right here, and if any gentleman desires to have this substantiated any further than by my naked statement, which I have given under oath, I will furnish you invoices and settlements to substantiate every word I have said.

Not only has the delivered price of beet sugar throughout this great interior district been lower this year than the price of cane sugar at the very doors of the eastern refineries but beet sugar has been sold all this season in every State in the Union except six or eight, and in nearly every market it has entered the delivered price of beet sugar has been from 40 to 50 cents per 100 pounds below the delivered price of cane sugar in that same market.

Were there time I could show you that this is no unusual condition. I could show you that a year ago the advent of beet sugar not only checked the arbitrary high price of cane sugar, fixed by the very refiners who are here asking for free trade or low duties, but forced these same refiners to drop their prices from 1½ to 2 cents per pound throughout the entire United States.

Now, why has this condition prevailed? Because these seventy-odd beet-sugar factories are competing with each other in this territory, and there have been only three potent cane refineries competing with themselves on the selling price of cane sugar. This is the reason that the prices of beet sugar during the beet-sugar season, in which we are now engaged, have been made independent of the price of cane sugar, and the low quotations that I have just given you are brought about by this competition between the beet-sugar people themselves. That is what I am getting at, and I bring it out for this purpose that if you wish to throttle that kind of competition and to turn this market over to the three refining companies who are asking for a low tariff or free trade on sugar you will introduce into the economic policy of this country the absence of that competition which you are trying to give to the people of the United States in order to regulate the price of foodstuffs.

Now, you have your choice of placing this matter of price in the hands of a great number of people who are competing for the market or putting it in the hands of three concerns. There is the whole question in a nutshell. Why? The honorable committee, in the report of the majority members of the committee accompanying their last bill on sugar, said that the cost of sugar in Germany, raw sugar, ranged from 1.96 to 2.07, and that the cost of refined sugar in Germany was 2.41½. The Michigan Sugar Co., I think, buys its sugar as cheaply as does any other company, and the Michigan Sugar Co. has paid for the extractable sugar in the beet during the time that it has been in operation $2.62 a hundred before beginning the process of manufacturing.

Gentlemen, raw material before it is touched in the factories costs $2.62 per hundred, and the cost of the sugar in Germany raw, ready for refinery, or refined sugar ready for the table is the price indicated, and there is but one thing for the domestic industry to do if they compete without a tariff with the foreign sugar—go out of business.

To drive it further home, Cuban sugar is selling to-day in New York for February, delivered, at 2 7/8 cents per pound in bond. You add 1.35 (round numbers), the Cuban tariff on that sugar, and you get 3.41, but leave out the tariff and that Cuban sugar, laid down in New York at the present daily quotation, costs but $2.06 per hundred pounds. I say that with that cost on foreign sugar they must go out of business unless something stands between them and that cost of foreign sugar, and when the domestic beet sugar goes out of existence you come to this one thing: That you have removed the only competition that stands between those three men and the feeding of 90,000,000 people with a necessity of life.

Gentlemen, if you put the great sugar industry upon the basis of free trade this is what you will do: You will make it possible for the great refining industries of this country which have the capacity to refine all the sugar 150,000,000 people would consume without adding any machinery to their present equipment, to arbitrarily fix the price of sugar, and you will put the consumers of this country in one of two positions. If the price does not go down to the consumer, then the domestic industry can survive, but under that condition you will rob the Treasury of the United States of more than $50,000,000 revenue which it is now collecting on imported sugar, and you will put that much money into the pockets of the refiners at New York. Or, if the price of sugar is lowered to the consumer just the amount of the reduction of the duty, you will then wipe out of existence this domestic industry, and as soon as that has been accomplished, once more the great refining interests of this country will control the supply of our sugar.

Go back only to 1911, during the summer months, when there was no domestic sugar upon the market, and what do we find? We found sugar in New York going as high as 7½ cents per pound f. o. b. New York. What was the occasion of that increased price of sugar, jumping up from 5½ cents per pound to 7½ cents per pound? It was because of the publications in the papers of New York that the price of refined sugar was based upon European raws, f. o. b. New York, or in bond in New York, plus the duty, which gave a quotation of $6.40 per hundred pounds for raw sugar, duty paid, delivered at the refineries in New York. Then they added to that amount 40 cents for refining and 60 cents per hundred pounds for profit and sold it at 7½ cents per pound, and claimed that they were justified in charging that price. Also remember at that time there was no beet sugar for sale. I obtained through the Treasury Department a certified copy of all of the importations of sugar into this country during those months, and for 12 months prior to that time, in every port of entry in the United States and from every country in the world from which a pound of sugar came, and there were no importations from Europe during the whole 16 months, with the single exception of confectionery sugar, which sold at 14 cents a pound. So the statement that European raws were selling on the New York market for $6.40 was incorrect. The highest price paid for any sugar in any month during the whole 16 months was $2.74 a hundred pounds. The sugar-refining companies of this country could have made a normal profit and put that sugar on the market for $5.20 a hundred pounds, but they charged 7½ a pound for it because there was no domestic competition. Yet our Democratic friends wish to wipe out of existence this domestic sugar industry of this country for the purpose, they say, of lowering the price, and thereby benefiting the consumers.

My Democratic friends, you have gone one step further. Boneblack is used in the refining of sugar. It is used chiefly in this country by the sugar-refining companies. Heretofore it has been on the protected list. You have now placed it on the free list, so that the Sugar Trust can buy abroad what boneblack is used—some 36,000,000 to 40,000,000 pounds a year—to aid in further lowering the cost of production, to punish domestic industries. The beet-sugar manufacturers use no boneblack at all.

Gentlemen, if your theories in 1894 were correct—that free trade would build up industries in this country, thereby aiding the laboring men of this country, and aiding also the consumer—if your arguments then were correct, your arguments to-day are correct. But were they correct then? No. You will admit and every other honest man will admit that you made a grievous mistake then.

One man said to me the other day, "Don't talk about the panic of 1894, 1895, and 1896; it is so far back I can't remember it." He reminded me of the Irishman when the girl in the hotel brought him a bowl of soup. He asked what kind of soup it was. She replied, "Ox-tail soup." "Begorra," said he, "that is from a long ways back, isn't it?" [Laughter.]

It is a long ways back—20 years—yes; but I was on earth at that time and in business. I was then in the flour-milling business, and I want to answer the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. HAMMOND] in regard to flour, for I have some knowledge of the manufacture of flour. I put $20,000 into a flour mill, and I remained in the business just as long as my money lasted, and when the company busted I went out of business; that was in 1896.

The gentleman from Minnesota tries to justify the lower rate of duty on wheat and free trade in flour. You may say that it is not free trade in flour; but it is free trade in flour in every sense of the word, because every country that wants our markets for their flour will take advantage of this proviso and remove their import duty; but it will not benefit our millers, for we do not sell flour to countries engaged in exporting flour to the United States.

What is the existing law? The gentleman from Minnesota, a gentleman for whom I have the highest regard, has by his industry taken care most thoughtfully of the great flouring mills of Minneapolis, St. Paul, and Duluth. Under existing law these mills can to-day import wheat in bond, mill it in bond, and ship it abroad without the payment of duty; but under existing law the by-products—bran and middlings—must also go abroad if milled in bond, and if it remains here it pays duty.

There is another provision of law under which the mills can bring in wheat from Canada, Alberta, and Saskatchewan, the greatest wheat country in the world, pay the duty of 25 cents per bushel, and when shipping abroad the manufactured product can get a drawback of 99 per cent of the duty paid; but this payment of duty on the by-product is the sticker. Some mill men appeared before the Ways and Means Committee four years ago begging the committee to put this by-product on the free list because they could not ship these by-products abroad. I know as a miller, from the experience I paid for, what this means.

Now, what have you done, my Democratic friends? You have provided in your bill that wheat can be imported into this country, and when the chief product of the raw material is shipped abroad, which is the flour out of the grain, no duty shall be collected upon the by-product, or in other words, that 99 per cent of the duty paid shall be refunded to the miller as a drawback.

Therefore under this bill you make it possible for the great mills in that country, some of which turn out as many as 12,000 to 15,000 barrels of flour a day, to import all the wheat they need for grinding flour for export without the payment of any duty at all except 1 per cent on 10 cents a bushel, and most of these great mills have water power which enables them to drive out of existence any mill which does not have cheap power.

What does it mean to the miller, my friend? It means free trade in wheat for every mill that wishes to grind flour for export.

I wish that some men in my State could take care of the industries of Michigan as well as the gentleman from Minnesota and other members of the committee have taken care of the great flouring mills of the Northwest. The gentleman says that our exports in agricultural products have fallen off. If they had increased he would have contended that we could compete, so why is this not positive proof that we need more protection?

Replying to his statement about increased exportations of manufactured goods and decreased exportations of agricultural products, I would say there has not been the change which the gentleman from Minnesota indicates. While it is true that the volume of our manufactured goods exported in 1910 is much greater than the value of our manufactured goods exported in 1880, it is equally true that the volume of our manufactured goods in 1910 is much greater than in 1880.

In 1880 we made $5,000,000,000 worth of manufactured goods, of which we exported $122,000,000 worth, or 2.4 per cent of our production. In 1910 we manufactured $21,000,000,000 worth of manufactured articles, of which we exported $667,000,000 worth, or 3.1 per cent of our production.

It will thus be seen that in 1880 we consumed at home 97.6 per cent of the manufactured articles we produced, while in 1910 we consumed 96.9 per cent of the manufactured articles we produced.

The Democratic policy says we must give our entire attention to enlarging our foreign trade, and the gentleman from Minnesota contends that if our manufacturers can export to the markets of the world we should greatly reduce our tariff and permit the manufacturers of the world to come here and compete in the United States with our own manufacturers. The fallacy of the argument is this: The Democratic Party would look after the 2 or 3 per cent of manufactured articles which we export, while the Republican policy would guard our home markets, which consume 97 to 98 per cent of the manufactured articles which we produce. Under the Republican doctrine our home manufacturers have increased their production from five to twenty-one billion dollars since 1880, whereas they have only increased their export trade from one hundred and twenty-two to six hundred and sixty-seven million dollars in the same time. In other words, the Republican Party thinks it a matter of greatest importance to the welfare of the people of the United States that the home markets, which consume 97 to 98 per cent of all our manufactured products should be most jealously guarded and that we should take potluck with the other nations of the world with the 2 per cent we send abroad. Moreover, we believe in such a law that will enable our manufacturers to increase the volume of their products in 30 years from five billion to twenty-one billion dollars rather than to follow the Democratic doctrine which would stop these manufacturers and give foreigners access to our markets, the greatest markets for manufactured articles in the world.

Now, I want to quote the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. He said yesterday in his remarks that his party would not injure a legitimate industry. If free trade is an injury to legitimate industry, what do you call the growing of wool? Is that a legitimate or an illegitimate industry? Free wool, as was the case under the Wilson-Gorman law, will destroy or greatly retard the woolgrowing industry and the sheep industry in this country unless the cost of living may keep up the price of mutton.

Therefore, by placing wool upon the free list, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and his party have branded the wool industry of this country as an illegitimate industry. When wool was placed on the free list in the Wilson-Gorman bill in 1894 our flock of sheep dwindled from about 50,000,000 head to 35,000,000 head inside of 36 months, and the value of sheep dwindled from $5 and $6 per head to from 75 cents to $1.50 a head. I remember in the winter of 1895 and 1896, in my home city, of seeing sleighs with hayracks upon them coming into town with the carcasses of sheep piled up like stacks of hay—your choice for 75 cents. Low cost of living all right, but the devil of it was nobody had the 75 cents. [Laughter.]

Mr. AUSTIN. What do they sell for to-day?

Mr. FORDNEY. The Tariff Board report shows that in 1911 the average sheep in the country was valued at $5.30 a head. Last fall during the campaign I saw a consignment of 100 head of 8-month lambs sold at the rate of $6.86 per head. I sold wool in the State of Michigan in 1896 for 7 cents a pound under free trade on wool. I went out of the business because I lost my farm. The man who held the mortgage changed places with me. [Laughter.]

Mr. LANGLEY. What will 8-month lambs be worth under the Underwood bill?

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, it will be like the fellow down at Chase's Theater this week. He was employed by a gang of thieves to assassinate people. He said that he would charge $15 a head for killing young ladies, $10 a head for married women, $5 a head for married men, and old maids for 15 cents a bunch; and the latter is about what those lambs will be worth. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from Alabama said the country is waiting for this bill to become a law. It is, with fear and trembling, my Democratic friends. [Laughter on the Republican side.] The people of Dayton, Ohio, waited for the flood, with fear and trembling, and it came, and what was the result? The people at Johnstown, Pa., a few years ago waited for the flood to come onto them after the great dam at the foot of a lake had broken, and when the flood came, what happened? The people of the country in 1894 waited for the Wilson-Gorman bill to become a law. It became a law, and heaven knows and you know what it brought—disaster, poverty, hunger, idleness, closed factories, and widespread ruin. It not only brought this, but it brought Coxey and his army to Washington, and when he got here what did he find? He found signs down here along the paths, "Coxey, keep off the grass." [Laughter.] The Russians waited at Port Arthur for the Japanese to come; they came. The Russians flew. Anyone who waits for destruction waits with fear and trembling, as the people of the United States wait for this bill to become a law.

Our good friend the President, in his message to Congress, said:

Whetting our wits, the object of the tariff.

He is somewhat late with this remark. The Wilson-Gorman bill was the originator of these words. That bill sharpened the wits of the voters in the United States, and at the November election of 1896 they went into the voting places all over this land with pencils sharpened at both ends and for a succeeding period of 16 years with whetted wits outwitted the free traders.

What have you done for the farmers of this country in this bill? You began with a pruning knife, sharp and keen, and you never failed to clip the feathers of a farmer every time his head bobbed up. You have left the duty on rye and on hops only, as it is in the present Payne tariff law.

I have figured on the basis of your reductions on the agricultural products, on just some of the products in the State of Michigan, which I have the honor in part to represent, and taking some products of the farm, not including animals, poultry, fruit, and so on, but just grain, potatoes, hay, etc., and from a fair estimate, if the reductions of the duty you have made will lower the price of those articles to the consumer the amount of duty removed, it will cost the farmers of Michigan from $75,000,000 to $100,000,000 a year to sustain the Democratic Party in power. They will willingly pay for their folly. The man who dances must pay the fiddler. The voters last fall danced, and the fiddler is at work. They will pay that price for two years, but as certain as the day follows the night, my friends, put this bill into effect and they will pay you back in your own coin.

You have reduced their wheat 60 per cent below the rate now fixed by law. You have placed potatoes on the free list as in 1894, when I saw potatoes sell for 12½ cents per bushel in the State of Michigan, and as a farmer sold them myself that year—one wagon load—the balance I fed to the hogs and then sold the hogs at 3 cents a pound. [Laughter.] I sold that load of potatoes for 12½ cents per bushel in the city of Saginaw in 1896. We had a most bountiful crop at that time, and that year Canada shipped into the State of Michigan, through the ports of entry at Port Huron and Detroit, a thousand and five carloads of potatoes, selling them at 12½ and 15 cents per bushel wholesale, and I never saw so many people hungry for potatoes in all my life. Why, they were so low in price it did not pay to steal them even. [Laughter.] Horses were so cheap one could afford to go afoot. [Laughter.] The very best of cattle, 3-year-old steers, I sold from my farm in 1895, in the State of Michigan, 3-year-old fat cattle, for $22 a head which would now bring me from $90 to $120 a head. Did free trade have anything to do with those values?

You propose to lower the price of those articles to the consumer. You certainly will lower prices. No intelligent man will dispute it; but by lowering prices the natural consequence is that the price of labor will also go down, and when the laboring man's purchasing power is lowered in a greater proportion than the necessaries of life, have you brought living any nearer to him? You know, my friends, that when you last had the power to put upon our statute books a free-trade bill—as you may call it, because there is a lot of free trade in the bill—and had exercised that power 3,000,000 of laboring men in this country were out of employment, which then constituted one-half the laboring men of the United States, and the wages of the other half were cut in two. Did you bring the necessaries of life any nearer to the consumers by such action than they are to-day? You will agree with me that we are fairly prosperous in this country to-day. You talk about extending our products across the sea, extending our commerce, getting a greater proportion of the world's markets than we now enjoy. The committee has an abundance of evidence before it that in England, Germany, and France, where the highest wages in any foreign country in the world are paid, the wages of those countries are less than half what is paid for the same class of labor in American mills and on American farms. How can you, my friends, meet the competition of foreign products of the farm and factory where labor enters largely into the cost of production? How can you meet the competition of that cheap labor in foreign countries unless you force the American standard of living and the American standard of wages down to the level of the cheap labor of the Orient and of Europe? [Applause on the Republican side.]

That kind of reasoning, my friends, was patented by an ex-Senator from the State of Indiana when he said in a speech that he favored a law, and he said that law can be written and shall be written, that will lower the hours for a day's work in this country. "I favor a law," said he, "and that law shall be written, that will increase the day's pay for that labor. I favor a law," said he, "and that law shall be written, that will lower the cost of the product of that man's labor." Oh, what nonsense. A barber a few days ago said to me it was practical to put into effect such a law. I said, "My friend, you know more about your own business than about any other man's business. You will admit that, will you not?" "Yes." "You are a barber working 10 hours a day." "Yes." "You are now cutting a man's hair, for which you charge 25 cents." "Yes." "Now, to lower the cost of the product of your labor is to lower the price for which you are cutting a man's hair." "Yes." "How are you going to work 8 hours a day instead of 10, cut men's hair for 15 cents instead of 25—lower the product of your labor—and yet increase your income? Tell me that, will you?" He said, "Oh, well, now, Mr. FORDNEY, that is not a fair illustration." "Well, it is one you know all about, and when you figure it out I will then listen to you in regard to the product of some other man's labor." And he has not figured it out yet. That is exactly identical, my friends, with your proposition, and as Congressman Springer claimed 20 years ago that by lowering the rate of duty on woolens and putting wool upon the free list we would give employment to 50,000 more employees in the woolen mills of this country; that we would increase wages, increase the demand for labor, and lower the price of the product to the consumer. That is what you propose to do now.

You certainly will lower the price to the consumer, but you will not bring the products which make up the necessaries of life any nearer to the poor people than they are to-day. You are mistaken, my friends. Aye, I give you credit for being candid, and I will say to the chairman of that committee, as I have often said before, that I hold him in the highest esteem and as a most estimable gentleman. I only differ with him in my political views. I believe I am right and that he is wrong in his conclusions. I appeal to you, before you force upon the people of this country this bill of which you are the author and which, in my opinion, will bring back practically such conditions as this country experienced from 1894 to 1897, to be most careful in your consideration of the rates you are fixing.

Who came before the Committee on Ways and Means asking for lower rates of duty? The importers of this country in great numbers. One gentleman from New York, as I now remember, a man by the name of Goldman, asked for lower rates of duty on wool and woolens, because the woolen mills of this country, as he said, were making excessive profits, and when pinned down to the facts in the case he knew nothing about any profit that any factories in this country were making. But he did know that in his own business, as a manufacturer of ready-made clothing, on a $200,000 investment, $50,000 of which was invested in machinery—and he also said that he borrowed some money—he did $3,000,000 worth of business per year; that he had reaped the magnificent profit of 9 per cent on $3,000,000, or $270,000 profit on a capital of $200,000, and was complaining about the great profits that the woolen manufacturers have made, but not asking for any lower rates of duty on his own products—ready-made clothing.

Gentlemen, what does the Tariff Board say about wool? They say that the rates of duty as provided for in the present tariff law, or some of the rates, are too high. But I can not find in their report a single utterance to the effect that 11 cents a pound on wool of the first class is too high—on a 50 per cent shrinking wool—to give adequate protection to the woolgrowers of this country.

The importations of class 1 wool are about a 50 per cent shrinking wool. They show that the cost of production of our best wools, wools of the first class, in this country are from 11 to 12 cents per pound after crediting up to the flock all the money received for the sale of sheep and lambs. They find that in South America, after giving the same credits to the flock, wool is produced there at from 4 to 5 cents per pound. They find in Australia, after giving the same credits to the flock, that there is practically no charge to the wool of Australia, except in the most remote parts of the country. So when Australian wool comes to the markets of the United States and meets the wool produced by the woolgrowers in this country, the American goes onto the market with a cost of 11 and 12 cents per pound on wool in the grease and meets the Australian wools with no charge against it. The wool of Australia is practically a by-product. Is it possible, then, for the American woolgrowers at that cost, under free wool, to compete in the markets of this country with foreign wool with very slight cost? I can not see that it is possible for them to do so.

Under the McKinley law the wool clip in the United States had reached 348,500,000 pounds in 1893, the largest clip ever grown in this country; nearly double the largest clip ever grown in Great Britain up to that time and when that country grew all the combing wool for the world's use; as large as the wool clip of Argentine Republic as late as 1888; as large as the wool clip of Australia as late as 1895; and equal to one-third of the available wool supply of all manufacturing nations as late as 1860.

The wool clip of the United States in 1893 was worth to the farmers of the country $52,200,000. The clip of 1896, according to current estimates, would not exceed $21,000,000 in value. That is what free wool did for our farmers the last time the experiment was tried by a Democratic Congress.

The Wilson-Gorman tariff law, as has been said, put raw wool on the free list and provided duties ranging from 40 to 50 per cent ad valorem on manufactured goods. The present Democratic tariff bill proposes to place raw wool on the free list and reduce the duties on manufactured goods to 35 per cent ad valorem. This bill is therefore a very much more radical measure than the Wilson-Gorman law of 1894, that whetted our wits so keenly. On the great amount of foreign goods that will come into the United States the rates in this bill are nearly one-third lower than the law of 1894, which brought ruin to the woolgrower and manufacturer alike. Wool values shrunk during the life of that bill from 40 to 50 per cent; the value of sheep shrunk more than 50 per cent; and the growing of wool and the raising of sheep was not profitable to the farmers of the United States. Since the repeal of the Wilson-Gorman law, in 1897, wages in the woolen mills of America have advanced on an average more than 50 per cent. These American wages are more than twice as high as English wages in the same calling, according to the comparisons presented in the Tariff Board's report. The wages of men engaged in the woolgrowing industry of the United States have also greatly increased since 1897. Yet the Democratic leaders, blind to the teachings of experience, have now brought forward a tariff measure calculated to wreck the woolgrowing and wool-manufacturing industry even more completely than they were wrecked by the law of 1894, that great wit whetter.

Representatives of the National Association of Wool Manufacturers, in presenting their views to the Committee on Ways and Means in the hearings during the month of January last, said in part:

> Accepting in good faith and with full confidence in its sincerity the assurance of the new administration that no legitimate business will be injured by the contemplated revision of the tariff, the National Association of Wool Manufacturers appears before your committee to urge a counsel of caution by indicating the conditions under which the woolen industry has been developed in the United States, and the impossibility of its continuance unless the rates of duty and the method of their application are such as will, under all the varying conditions of trade and fluctuations of values, permit the domestic manufacturers successfully to meet the competition of their foreign business rivals. The woolen industry claims its place among the legitimate businesses of the people, for it was brought into existence in consequence of various Federal laws enacted for the express purpose of developing that business in this country. Its existence has been possible only because of such laws, and the operations and conduct of the business have been in strict conformity with law, the domestic woolen trade having been in an unusual degree free from complaint of lawbreaking.
> Simultaneously with the competition for labor there was created by the increasing productive capacity a competition in the sale of products that has steadily reduced the margins of profit now in the case of the woolen industry the normal manufacturing profit is probably less than that of any of the other domestic industries and is certainly as little as in the woolen industry of Great Britain or the other manufacturing countries of Europe.

How much time have I remaining, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 10 minutes remaining.

Mr. FORDNEY. In the 10 minutes I can not say all I would like to say; but I do want to say this, my friends: When the Republican Party went out of power in 1893 and the Democratic Party came into power it has ever since been claimed by the Democratic Party that the Republican Party left matters in such shape that the result was a panic because of a depleted Treasury. This morning before coming to the House I picked up a Treasury report, and I find that to-day there is in the Treasury of the United States in the redemption fund and in the Treasury to redeem gold certificates outstanding and in the general fund $1,256,000,000 of gold coin and gold bullion. Never in the history of the world was there ever more than $600,000,000 in any treasury in the world.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for just a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the gentleman state how much surplus the Republican administration left in the Treasury on the 4th of March?

Mr. FORDNEY. Of this year?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. My friend, they left you with enough to run the machinery of the Government, and now, when prosperity is abroad over the land, you have not yet had to resort to the issuing of Government bonds. But heaven knows you will if you put this bill into effect. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I want to call your attention to this fact, that you can not hereafter claim that because of the condition of the Treasury and because of the condition of our revenues as compared with our expenditures you can attribute the next panic to the administration of William H. Taft. [Applause on the Republican side.]

You may say that we have a little more surplus in the Treasury to-day than we had a year ago. Is it due to the economy of the Democratic Party, when, during the last session of Congress, you admitted that you made greater appropriations than had been made by any previous Congress? I set about the other day to figure how long it would take to accumulate a fund sufficient to meet the annual expenditures of the Federal Government with such appropriations as you made last session; and at the rate of a dollar a minute, in order to create that fund, I found that it would have had to been started 200 years before the birth of Christ, and then you would not have enough to-day. [Applause on the Republican side.]

You are spending some money, and that money must come from some direction. The people of this country must pay it. You propose to put sugar on the free list, and there has never been a country under the sun in modern times that ever had sugar on the free list except England for a short while.

Mr. HARDWICK. England never did have a duty on sugar until after the Boer War began.

Mr. FORDNEY. I excepted England, the gentleman will observe, but it is true that from 1660 down to 1874 England maintained a duty on imported sugar, and at one time, as late as 1840, that duty ranged as high as 38 cents per pound. In 1874 she placed sugar on the free list and at that time was refining at home 95 per cent of her home consumption. Sugar remained on the free list in England from 1874 down to 1901 and during that period most of her refineries were relegated to the scrap heap. That is England's experience with free sugar. At the time of the Boer War she again placed a duty on sugar of 90 cents per 100 pounds, and in 1908 lowered the duty to 40.1 cents per 100 pounds. She is now refining about 45 per cent of her home consumption. Therefore during the past 253 years England has maintained a duty on sugar nine-tenths of the time. Her experience with free trade on sugar is anything but an argument in favor of your free-sugar proposition. As soon as they got into that trouble they put a duty on sugar.

There is no country in the world except England where a dollar will buy more granulated sugar than it will buy in the United States this very minute. [Applause on the Republican side.]

But when you consider a man's daily purchasing power, rather than his pay in dollars and cents, and that is the real test of the cost of living, you will find the average laboring man can buy 43 pounds of sugar for a day's work in this country, whereas an Englishman can buy but 21 pounds for his day's work. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Permit me for a moment to refer to cotton. You come from the land of cotton, my Democratic friends, and you have paid your respects to the cotton-manufacturing industry of the North. How? One Mr. Parker, of South Carolina, president of 16 cotton factories, testified before the Committee on Ways and Means that we could stand a reduction of duty on cotton goods. I asked Mr. Parker whether there was any difference in the scale of wages paid in his State or in his part of the South as compared with the rate of wages paid in the cotton mills in the North. You remember much has been said about the pauper wages paid in the cotton mills in the State of Massachusetts. Mr. Parker said he found upon investigation that there was no practical difference between the rates of wages paid in his locality and in the North.

Now, since Mr. Parker made that statement I have been investigating, and let me tell you what I find. I find the highest wages paid in the cotton mills of any State in the Union, with the single exception of Pennsylvania, are paid in the State of Massachusetts.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. And how about the hours of labor?

Mr. FORDNEY. I am basing the rate of wages upon the same hours per day.

I find, moreover, the lowest scale of wages paid in any State in the Union, except Tennessee, which has but few mills, are paid in the two States, North and South Carolina, where Mr. Parker's factories are located.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. That is right.

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me tell you what that difference is: Basing the average wages paid in the cotton mills in North and South Carolina on 300 days' employment the wages are 85 cents a day—the magnificent sum of 85 cents a day in North Carolina and South Carolina. In the same way, basing a man's pay on 300 days per year in the North, and especially in Massachusetts, what did I find? I found the rate of wages paid in cotton mills in the North to be 62 per cent higher than the rate of wages paid by Mr. Parker.

Consider that, gentlemen. Adequate protection to the products of the factories in North and South Carolina means destruction to the cotton mills in New England. You say we can export some of our cotton products. That is true of certain grades where machinery does the largest part of the manufacturing. We find that cotton factories in the United States last year, with 29,500,000 spindles, consumed practically 5,000,000 bales of cotton, while England, with 54,200,000 spindles, consumed but 3,500,000 bales. What does that prove? It proves that we are making the coarser grades of cotton where machinery does the largest portion of the work of production, and that England, with her cheap labor, is making the higher grades of goods which require a larger amount of hand labor. That is what it proves.

France to-day admits our raw cotton free of duty, but she imposes a very high rate of duty on manufactured goods. If a manufacturer from the United States to-day took into France knit goods, such as hosiery and knit gloves, the product of one bale of raw cotton manufactured, he would have to take along a sum equal to the price of 11 bales of raw cotton to pay the duty on the manufactured product of that one bale of manufactured cottons. That is what France is doing to protect her cotton mills.

If you go to Germany it is about the same. Further than that, the railroads of Germany impose a higher freight rate on imports going into Germany from a seaport to an inland town than on goods that originate in Germany; but in order to encourage the exportation of her goods she gives a lower rate of freight on goods from an interior town to a seaport, where the goods are to be exported, than she gives on goods for consumption within the boundaries of Germany.

Germany would give us anything on this green earth under a reciprocity agreement if she could only get into our markets with her raw sugar free. She is the great beet-sugar producing country of the world, and Mr. Lowry states that the German farmer receives more per ton for his beets, delivered at the factories in Germany, than the farmers of this country receive.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman give me a few minutes more?

Mr. PAYNE. How many minutes? The gentleman knows that my proportion of time is over now.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes. Will the gentleman give me 10 minutes?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes; I will give the gentleman 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. The statement of Mr. Lowry is absolutely incorrect. It is as misleading as all other statements made by that free-trade lobbyist of the Sugar Trust in this country. They have in Germany cooperative factories, where the farmers own the stock of those factories. When those farmers haul their beets to the factory they get an average price of $4.45 per ton. That was the price for beets last year, according to German statistics. But when the season's grind has been turned out, for the purpose of evading a corporation tax, instead of paying a dividend to their stockholders, they call back the farmers who furnished the beets and pay them their profit as an increased price upon their beets, and not as a profit upon their stock. That is for the sole purpose of evading the payment of a corporation tax. But the factories that are not cooperative paid last year in Germany $4.45 a ton for their beets, containing a fraction above 17 per cent of saccharine content, whereas the factories of this country last year paid $6.50 per ton for beets containing a 15 per cent saccharine content. That is the difference between the price paid in this country and the low price paid in Germany. In France the price received by the farmers was $4.22 a ton for beets containing 17 per cent of sugar.

In Germany and France this industry has gone on for a hundred years, and the farmers have become educated so that they get a larger percentage of sugar in their beets by more intense or practical cultivation. And there is extracted to-day from a ton of beets in Germany, testing 17 per cent, 30 to 40 pounds more sugar than can be extracted from a ton of beets in this country, testing exactly the same percentage, due to the greater purity of the sugar content. So that the price of the sugar content in the beets of the factories in Germany is one-third to one-half lower than to the factories of this country. The contention of the gentleman from New York on that point, therefore, is absolutely wrong.

Now, as a compliment to my friend from New York, Mr. Goldman, who wants a lower rate of duty on woolens—the Tariff Board, whose report you absolutely ignore, a report made by three Republicans and two Democrats, a unanimous report, does not recommend rates for us to fix in the law, but furnishes us with the facts as it finds them. They followed the wool from the sheep's back to the man's back, as an illustration, and what did they find? They found that it required 9.7 pounds of wool to make an average suit of ready-made clothing that sells in the market for about $23. They found, without crediting the farmer with the interest invested in the sheep, he made 68 cents profit on that 9.7 pounds of wool. Figuring 6 per cent interest on the money invested left him 20 cents profit on that 9.7 pounds of wool, which is practically a fleece and a half, or the wool from a sheep and a half. They found, when following the cost to the factory, that the farmer received 16 cents a pound for the wool, and the manufacturer paid 23 cents for the wool delivered at his factory. When sold as cloth to make the suit of clothes, the manufacturer's product was 17 cents on the pattern for a suit of clothes.

But when it went to Mr. Goldman, of New York, to manufacture ready-made clothing, when he converted that cloth into a suit of clothes, his profit was $2.25. He sells the suit of clothes for $16.50, and it is retailed for $23. That is according to the report of the Tariff Board. So the farmer made 20 cents after allowing him interest on the money invested in his sheep, the woolen manufacturer made 17 cents, and Mr. Goldman makes $2.25, and then the retailer in some way gets $6.50 for his trouble, insurance, expense, and profit.

I ask you which of the four men needs protection, Mr. Goldman, the retailer, the farmer, or the manufacturer? Remember, my friends, that the manufacturers of woolen goods to-day in this county are employing 200,000 American workmen. Are you going to, by closing the doors of these factories, turn one-half of these laboring men out of employment as you did in 1894, cut the income of the other half in two, and do likewise with the 275,000 men in your cotton mills? According to your promise you are going to reduce the price by one-half, and yet you are going to make this a land of sunshine where milk and honey will flow, where men can sit around in idleness, have more to eat, more to wear, more to say, and less to do. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] That is your proposition.

In conclusion, gentlemen, in preparing this bill you have repudiated the Tariff Board and its reports; you have turned a deaf ear to the sworn testimony of our manufacturers, preferring to accept statements from importers as to the cost of manufacturing; you have closed your eyes to what past experience has shown; and, in short, in the fixing of tariff rates you have inaugurated a guessing contest of heretofore unheard of magnitude upon the result of which hangs the industrial welfare of our Nation.

I thank you, gentlemen. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. How does the gentleman figure that the panic of 1893 was caused by a tariff law that was not enacted until 1894?

Mr. FORDNEY. Anticipation, my friend, is everything on this earth, and if anticipation will bring on a panic, what will the enactment of the law do?

Mr. GORDON. One other question. How does it come that this bill, which is a lower tariff rate in its average than the Wilson law, has not brought on a corresponding panic?

Mr. FORDNEY. Because the coffers of the laboring men and the banks are full to overflowing, and they will not feel the effect of it until their hard-earned savings have been depleted. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL].

A REPLY TO REPUBLICAN CRITICS.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, the new Members of this House on the Democratic side have during the past few days been repeatedly advised with paternal solicitude by the minority as to what position we should take with reference to the pending tariff bill. We have been chided for doing all we could in the Democratic caucus for the industries of our own States and for supporting the bill now after it has been indorsed by an overwhelming majority of the Democratic House. We have been told that the leaders of the Democratic Party are trying to coerce us by withholding patronage and by delaying committee assignments until after the tariff bill has been passed. We are told that we are being bossed, and that it is cowardly not to break away from the Democratic leaders, and thus create a spirit of revolt in the ranks of the Democracy of the country.

I come from a section where there is but one party, and that party is sometimes divided into two factions—the "ins" and the "outs." The assets, the stock in trade, of the "outs" is to create a spirit of dissatisfaction, of restlessness, of revolt among the rank and file of the "ins," and thus pluck away some of the support of the majority. It is an old, old game; but, Mr. Chairman, I did not expect to find any of this caliber of peanut politics in this great body. When I was a schoolboy in the country I read with cordial interest and even with a feeling of reverence the inspiring speeches of the reformers and leaders of the minority party in the Congress of the United States. I noted that the minority was always opposed to what was actually being done; but somehow I got the impression that these leaders of the minority were inspired men. In my childish mind I could see them—great tall men, with soulful eyes, each wearing a white plume, sitting on a prancing charger, leading the toiling masses out from the boudage of the majority into lavish wealth and boundless freedom.

But since coming here I find that they are not wearing any white plumes, and they are not even sitting on a horse. They are sitting on the fence waiting to find out what position the Democratic majority will take, so they can oppose that position. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

As to our being coerced by delaying committee assignments, the Committee on Ways and Means asked the Democratic caucus for instructions on this point, and that committee was instructed to delay all other matters and devote themselves now to this tariff legislation, because the people are demanding and have a right to expect immediate action in the interest of the legitimate industries of the country. The new Members participated in giving these instructions, and the new Members on the Democratic side are satisfied.

As to the other charges against the Ways and Means Committee and against the President of the United States, that the new Members are being whipped into line by withholding patronage, I wish to speak as one of the new Members. The men whom I have recommended for postmasters have been nominated. I have been in Washington for two months. I have visited the President, and I have been thrown with the Speaker of the House and the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee. I live at a hotel with several members of the Ways and Means Committee, and I have never had one word of advice, a suggestion, or a request as to how I should vote, what I should do, or what I should not do. It remains for me as a new Member to be called upon to express profound and lasting gratitude for paternal solicitude as to how I should vote, sympathetically and repeatedly expressed by both prongs of the forked minority of the House. [Applause and laughter.]

To the able and respected floor leader of the long prong of the forked minority, whose chief at the November election was retired permanently to private life because he is a natural-born private citizen, I wish respectfully to say that whether the new Members have rings or ropes in their noses, as he expressed it, we are voluntarily and vigorously in favor of this tariff revision downward in the interest of the American consumers, and we will fight for this bill as it came from the Democratic caucus, his graceful effort to cause dissension to the contrary notwithstanding. No one knows better than he that the surest way to destroy a party is to create discord in its ranks.

To the able, eloquent, and very noisy leader of the other and shorter prong of the minority, sometimes called Bull Moosers, I wish to say, with respect, that his solicitous concern lest the new Members on the Democratic side by voting with the majority should be called cowards and weaklings is gratefully appreciated. But Bull Moose has been analyzed, and the analysis at the November election showed only 1 per cent Moose and the other 99 per cent is being used here, as it was successfully used with the Republicans, in an effort to confuse and disrupt the Democratic Party, if possible, by dissatisfying the new Members.

If it had been left to the new Members, several other articles which the farmers have to buy, such as hats, clothing, all woolen garments, matches, buttons, brooms, books, paper, pottery, and cutlery, including castor oil, would be added to the free list, and our revenue would come from the income tax and luxuries, including beverages, silks, rubber, and diamonds. You high-tariff gentlemen should be satisfied and thankful for an average reduction of only 26 per cent, as this bill carries.

We, the new Members, come fresh from the homes and firesides of the people. We have felt their pulse. We know their hopes, their expectations, and their demands. We are determined to obey them. The American people have expressed their will in unmistakable terms by indorsing not the Republican high-tariff platforms but by accepting the Baltimore Democratic platform for a revision of the tariff downward and by directing and ordering the Democratic Party to assume full responsibility and to express that will in definite, concrete action in the interest of the producing, toiling, consuming masses who give character and hope to this Republic. [Applause.]

The people have willed it, and it is your duty and mine to obey their will by enacting into law this tariff bill, which is the longest step taken within a hundred years in giving justice to the rich and the poor alike by creating equal, competitive mobility of opportunity in our approach to a real democracy.

The new Members feel the solemn pledges made our people, and with all the courage and manhood we possess this new Member will fulfill those pledges by supporting a Democratic measure which the people on last November ordered enacted into law.

Gentlemen, your game is moss covered [laughter and applause], your methods are crude, the new Members on this side are happy, and Democracy is united and triumphant.

Our leaders are not enforced, but selected voluntarily and joyously, and we shall fight this battle for the plain people of America honestly, courageously, and loyally to the end.

In the Democratic caucus I worked earnestly for the industries of my State. If I should write a tariff bill there are several changes I would make in this bill. Several provisions do not please me or my home people, but on the whole the bill is Democratic and is in line with the Baltimore platform. So much better is it than our present tariff laws, that as a Democrat I shall defend it all the way against the Republican attacks. [Applause on the Democratic side.] In doing this I am only obeying the will of my people and the people of the entire country, who have decreed by their ballots that the laborer, the producer, and the consumer shall be freed from the oppressive hand of the privileged classes who have been in partnership with the Government to plunder the toiling masses and rob them of their just share of the products of their labors. A new era has come, a new day is approaching when the burden of the oppressed shall be lightened, and men and women and children in all walks of life shall be free. The Democratic Party has been commissioned to work out this high destiny, and with our able leaders working in harmony with these patriotic men, we shall not fail to serve faithfully and well those who have trusted and commissioned us. [Tremendous applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN].

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I have remained here for two days listening to the arguments expressed on this floor, and to my surprise I find the minority party presenting the views that this great Government is the guardian of the industries of this Nation. I hold to the tenet that this Government does not hold the dollar above the man. I hold to the tenet that this Government should levy tribute for no purpose except to defray the honest and legitimate expenses of the Government economically administered. I hold to the tenet that a tariff to protect industries is unconstitutional. I hold to the tenet that this Government is for the people and not for the privileged classes. The distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] told you that the old Republican ship was soon to come into port in the shape of a dreadnought. I thought he discovered last November that this great ship which has been afloat on the seas of politics for 60 years had been loaded with a cargo of special privileges, combines, monopolies, trusts, and a high-protective tariff. Does not the gentleman know that ex-President Roosevelt scuttled the ship, and she now has her stern sticking above the waters, a sad memento of the pristine glories of the old Republican Party? I want to say to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] that we have no oligarchy, as he describes, that framed this tariff bill, but a band of patriots united in one important purpose, and that is to give to every man, woman, and child in this whole Republic a square and honest deal. That band of men had no whip, as he said, held over them by the White House, waiting for the shaking of the plum tree. I want to say the President of the United States needs no defense at the hands of this Congress. The American people have confidence in him. They know that he is standing for the plain people of this country. They know that the President of this Republic is not marching hand in hand with the great protected industries and the special privileged classes to oppress the people.

I want to say to my distinguished friend from Wyoming, when he said that way back yonder the old patriarch stood out with his staff and saw the star of Bethlehem and went to see the newborn Saviour, and he said those shepherds now in the West were being oppressed because of the fact this Democratic Congress was threatening them with free wool. Well, I want to tell him those shepherds in Palestine did not go and say to the mother of the Saviour, You must pay tribute on wool. Is it possible that this Republican from Wyoming wants the cold winds of the fall and winter to fall against the bare bones of the little boys and girls of this country? Is it possible that the owners of the great flocks of sheep want to hold up the price of wool so that the poor people of this country can not buy woolen clothing? I want to say to my friend that the great Woolen Trust, the great manufacturers of this country, do not intend these producers of wool to get any more for it, even if there were a 50 per cent protective tariff on it. They control the price of wool; the producer has nothing to do with it. Do you not know free wool will not reduce the price of wool one dime? When you analyze it, the great trust that controls the buying of hides for the shoe industry, the great trust that controls the buying of wool, will not let the producers of this country fix the price. That is as absolute as the law of the Medes and Persians. [Applause.] My friend then discussed the sugar question. Why, I did not know that the American Government owed any special duty to any man engaged in any industry to be fed out of the pockets of labor. Listen. In the State of Louisiana, according to the figures, there are 329,000 acres of land under sugar-cane culture; there are only $30,000,000 invested, and this Government permits a tax of $115,000,000 a year, $4.92 to the average family of five, to be collected out of the pockets of the people of this country to protect the sugar and the beet industry of this Republic. The evidence before the Committee on Ways and Means shows that the sugar industry, so far as the beet business is concerned, can prosper under free sugar.

Do you not know that under the figures submitted you can give $30,000,000 to the cane-sugar planters of Louisiana, and in addition thereto give them $258 per acre for every acre of land that they have under culture and have a few dollars left out of this $115,000,000 that you collect every year in the shape of a tariff that goes only one-third to the Government? My friend then talks about the laboring man and the farmer. He does not know what a farmer is. He knows of the ranchman and the landlord. I will tell him what a farmer is. He is a patriot who gets up at 4 o'clock in the morning, goes out to the barn and feeds his mule; gets back, eats a little breakfast, gets on that mule and goes to the field and plows hard until 12 o'clock. The dinner horn blows, he takes out, he trots up to the house, eats a little dinner, hurries back to the field, and plows right along as long as he can see. [Applause.]

You talk about being a friend to that fellow! I tell you what you Republicans have done. You put a high tariff on the plow which he uses, on the harness he puts on his mule; you put a high tariff on the lumber in his house and on the bed he sleeps in. You put a tariff on the brick which he put into his chimney. You placed a tariff on his wife's dress, and you put a tariff on the wire fence that goes around his field, and on the wagon with which he hauls his produce to town. Do you tell me you know that man? You could not have known him or you would not have treated him so mean.

You did not stop with that. You built great battleships out of his pocket and provided for a big standing army. He kept these big factories that you have been protecting with these special privileges going. He is the man who has kept all the wheels of the factories that you pretend have been running for the interests of the laboring men moving. He is the man who keeps the salaries of the Congressmen paid. You certainly can not be his friend! [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It is the policy of the Republican Party to keep poor people poor. You do not want them to get up in life. You want to build fortunes for multimillionaires, to be guarded by the battleships you have been building out of the pockets of the poor man.

I want to say that these farmers had a reckoning last November. [Applause on the Democratic side.] They sent a crowd to Congress that is going to stand up for them. They put a President in the White House who is going to stand up for their cause. The farmer is a patriot who has fought the battles of this country. He is the fellow who caused the flag to float over this building. He is the fellow that won our independence from Great Britain. He is ready now to defend this Government when enemies attack it, and I for one am going to stand by him and fight for his rights. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The farmer that I know down in the vegetable district is the man who with his wife and his family, from the little child of 4 years old up to the young lady with the sweet bloom of health upon her, is out in the field at work from early dawn to as late as they can see at night, working those vegetables, so that the family can live, even if they have been constantly robbed by the tariff barons and overcharged by the transportation companies. And I want to tell you something else: You Republicans have kept this man from getting the value of his products. The transportation companies of the country have charged him about 55 per cent of the gross value of his vegetables to get them to the markets. And then you have had him taxed to death for the fertilizers and agricultural implements which he uses to make his crop. We are going to put all agricultural implements of every kind, together with lumber and barb wire, on the free list.

But I want to say that those are the people democracy is going to help; those are the people the Democratic Party is going to stand up for.

You talk about these great special industries you have been standing for. You want them to steal from the people so that they can help the laboring man, do you? Let us see. You give to the shoe industry the privilege to rob him on his shoes and to the hat industry to rob him on the hat he wears and to the clothing industry the privilege of robbing him on his clothing, and you charge him a tariff on the bucket in which he carries his food and 20 per cent on the bread and biscuits in that bucket. You charge him a tariff on the house in which he has to live. Do you mean to tell sensible people that you believe in the laboring man? You import all the foreign scum of creation here to lower the price of his wages. Are you his friend? Do you believe in protecting these great industries and at the same time having a free market for labor? You want all the competing forces of alien races, the inferior races of this world, to be brought in here and placed in competition with the Caucasian labor of America. Do you not know that labor receives its rights only through organization? I believe in unions; I believe in labor organizations. That is the way the laborers get the value of their work, and even then they can not get a sufficient value. Do you not know that the great railway companies of this country to-day would not be paying the laboring man half the price they do if it were not for all the transportation men and shopmen having their various unions and organizations? That is plain. Every man knows that it is true. Do you not know that when this great strike occurred up at Lawrence, Mass., in that woolen industry which you gentlemen had given a privilege to rob the people all the way from 75 to 125 per cent, that those little children, although they were working in a woolen industry, were going around half naked and without a rag of wool on them?

That is the way you favor the laboring man. Is it not time to let democracy stand up and do something for the people of this Republic? Is it not time for you to say, "Let democracy put in force a bill that stands for the integrity of manhood; that stands for womanhood; that stands for patriotism?" Let democracy put in a bill that is going to take away all special privileges; that is going to break down monopoly; that is going to stop the great forces of the money power from reaching out in every direction, even to the little $25,000 crossroad banks in Mississippi, bossing them with a tyrannical hand and a Shylock spirit.

Why, my friends, you know you have sent out literature in every style, type, shape, and form, for the purpose of fooling the American people. You even have it so now that every cashier of a little crossroad bank, will put his thumbs in the armholes of his vest and talk about "we." He thinks he is like Mr. John D. Rockefeller. He thinks he is like Mr. Carnegie. He is a protectionist. He believes you ought to give some great manufacturing interest the privilege of robbing all the people.

I do not think that any industry ought to want to reach down into the pockets of the people of this Republic and take away from them an unfair proportion of the rewards of their toil; and for one, I am going to stand by this bill. I am going to stand by the Democratic leader. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I am going to stand with the President of this Nation. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CRISP). The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the time is controlled by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I would be glad to yield further time to the gentleman from Mississippi, but the gentleman will understand that that would interfere with the allotment of time to be given other gentlemen.

Mr. GUDGER. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] may be willing to be given the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN] 10 minutes of his time.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] apportion some of his time?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, in behalf of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], and at the request of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS] is recognized.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, this bill is an open and confessed assault upon the doctrine of protection. There is no concealment. There is no pretense of incidental protection, but the assault is made upon the protective system as vicious and unconstitutional.

When every civilized government except England adopts the principles of the protective tariff, and England is back-pedaling on her free-trade theories, it is left for the Democratic Party in the face of logic, fact, and experience to revamp her old-time traditional free-trade notions.

According to the protective theory the tariff walls should be high enough to shut out all foreign products except:

(1) To admit foreign goods that can not be produced at home or that are produced here in insufficient quantity to supply the demand.

(2) To admit foreign goods for the purpose of raising revenues.

(3) To admit foreign goods whenever in default of proper regulations monopolies or near monopolies of the home market have been created.

In such cases if the monopoly is beyond the reach of regulation of preventive law, until such regulations could be provided I would knock holes in the tariff big enough to let in competition until the home market should be supplied at fair prices.

According to the protective theory the competition that ensues between home manufacturers insures the lowest prices compatible with a living American wage. The height, therefore, of the tariff wall is negligible, provided that it shuts out foreign goods that can be produced here.

Considered from the protective theory alone there is no need to split hairs in the ascertainment of the exact rate which will admit foreign goods at the precise point where the American manufacturer exacts more than a reasonable profit. But when it is used as a fiscal agency, there the problem is more complex, because the rate must be fixed at a point that will produce the desired revenue and still preserve a fair measure of protection, and when it is sought to make tariff rates so as to raise a definite revenue, and at the same time to make them the instrument with which to destroy monopolies, the problem is vastly more difficult.

The Democratic Party has set out to accomplish a number of desirable things by a tariff law:

1. To abolish monopolies.
2. To reduce the cost of living.
3. To raise necessary revenues.

Free trade will never abolish monopolies. It may afford a temporary relief, but eventually it drives the monopoly into international combination beyond the reach of any control.

Free-trade England started the ball rolling 140 years ago with a Coal Trust. She has her trusts in shipbuilding, copper, tobacco, textiles, and 35 or 40 others, all of monopolistic character. You may assume that a protective tariff fosters monopolies, if you please, yet it is clear that free trade does not prevent them.

Banking will foster bank robberies if you have no laws against burglaries, but would you abolish the banks to get rid of the robbers?

The combinations of purse and effort of many men make possible achievements utterly impossible to the individual. Without them we would not have a railroad, a telegraph, a steamship, nor any of the great producing plants that are putting at the command of the average citizen comforts, raiment, and subsistence, denied to the kings of 100 years ago.

I harbor no prejudice against big business simply because it is big. For 30 years I have believed that the Government must control big business or big business would control the Government. I have seen its growing power in this country. The average citizen is convinced of their undue power in the Government. Believing that by secret alliances with the leaders of both the old parties that they exercised such control, the people in wrath turned against the Republican machine, which was in power, and put the Democratic Party in control, not that the Democratic Party heretofore had proved itself less amenable to big business than the Republican Party had been, not because they believed in the Democratic idea of the tariff, but rather in the hope that the Democratic Party, taking counsel with what had befallen the Republican Party, would destroy special privilege and surround big business and all other business within the jurisdiction of Congress with such proper hedges and regulations as would safeguard the Government from their undue influences and would strictly confine these great combinations within the proper sphere of their legitimate actions.

If under the protective system advantage has been taken by these unregulated combinations to create monopolies, the remedy is not to strike down American industries and surrender our markets to the foreigner, but the true remedy is regulation by law that will destroy the monopoly.

Without effective laws to restrain monopolies and prohibit restraints of trade, peculiar alliances between the interests profiting by a high tariff and powerful representatives of the Republican Party, aided and abetted by powerful representatives of the Democratic Party, have grown up under a high tariff.

The incalculable power of colossal millions—millions in banking, in commerce, in transportation, in manufacturing—confederated upon concerted lines of control, going the way of all human nature, and like the daughter of the horseleech continually crying, "More, more, more!" constitutes an invisible government that has stood behind the chairs of authority and has created an atmosphere throughout this broad land under the influence of which the editor at his desk, the voter at the polls, the legislator at the capitals of States and Nation, and even the judge upon the bench, fawns and cringes.

And so it is charged, and the people have come to believe, and the fact has been, that the high tariff, in the absence of proper regulations and criminal law, fosters monopoly, and the demand of all parties has been for a revision of the tariff downward, but that demand does not imply the abandonment of the protective principle.

The demand for revision downward is a "short cut" to correct alliances between crooked business and crooked politics that have been eating the hearts of the people.

In the absence of proper laws to restrain monopolies a speedy cure is sought in the tariff, but nevertheless a great majority of the American people believe in the protective tariff.

The Democratic Party has no commission from the people to pass a free-trade measure. They have no commission to strike down protection. Even the minority who voted for Mr. Wilson are greatly divided upon this question.

And in a free Congress—free from the duress of official patronage, free from the domination of caucus, and free from boss rule—I do not believe that the representatives of the Democratic Party in this House, with the opportunity given them to examine for themselves, with the right given them to decide for themselves, schedule by schedule, free from duress, would ever offer such a bill as this.

Free trade does not prevent monopolies, nor will the opening of our markets to foreign competition, but it will, on the contrary, stimulate and encourage international trusts and combinations which will be utterly beyond control or regulation.

On the other hand, a protective tariff is the only defense against international monopolies by shutting them out, while leaving the Government a free hand with which to deal with all domestic restraints of trade monopolies and extortions through regulations of law.

Mr. Chairman, I have been a Republican—a life-long believer in the doctrine of protective tariff. As a member of the Progressive Party I still hold to that doctrine. But in common with many other believers in protection, I think many of the rates should be reduced, so that, in the absence of other proper regulations, the Government will have some control over trade combinations that are exacting unreasonable profits. Yet I still believe that if you destroy the protective principle these international combinations will form, and they are forming, international combinations which will place the whole subject matter beyond the control of the American Congress.

It has been loudly heralded that the proposed bill will reduce the cost of living.

No one more powerfully supported the Democratic claims in the Sixty-second Congress and in the recent campaign than the present Secretary of the Treasury. He and the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means agree that this bill may not much reduce the cost of living. But now that the Democratic Party is installed in power and required to redeem its promises, they have begun to look around for a soft spot to fall on.

If correctly reported, in a recent interview the Secretary says, substantially, that the lowering of the tariff may help some in lowering the cost of living after a while, but he is convinced now that the real cause of the high cost of living is bad roads, poor farming, and inefficiency in production and distribution. This looks like hunting a hole to crawl into. Still I think he is nearer right now than he was when on the stump claiming, in chorus with his Democratic brethren, that the high tariff was the cause of the high cost of living.

I fear the effect of this bill in reducing the cost of living will be a great disappointment to the people of the country and to its authors. The political parties of this country are confronted by a situation that is not to be relieved by infinitesimal changes in the cost of lemons, sweet oil, or other comestibles.

We are in the midst of a great social movement that is stirring to the depths every civilized country in the world. It is a natural evolution to higher standards; it is the searching, striving of humanity for betterment; it is the demand for enlarged social justice; it is the demand of the people for the protection of the home; the sweetening of the lives of the toiling millions; for the abolition of special privileges; for the destruction of that invisible government that has been in control for selfish and corrupt purposes. And it is not to be appeased by any makeshifts of the tariff, important as that may be.

The Republican leaders proclaim this movement to be the "fanaticism of unbalanced enthusiasm." They affect to believe that it is a small shower and will soon be over. And through their blindness and disbelief 4,000,000 voters of the Republican Party left it and, taking with them the heart and soul of republicanism, formed the Progressive Party. Owing to this division, the Democratic Party has been put in power by a minority of the votes, and they can not expect to remain in power by sending to the people a bill of this character, which, at the best, confessedly now, will affect the cost of living but slightly and which will, I fear, have very disastrous effect upon the industries of the country.

Now, in respect to revenues. Your Democratic platform proclaims the astounding doctrine that a protective tariff is unconstitutional, though in practice you distinctly abandon that and, taking the middle of the road, adopt the tariff for revenue only, adopting high protective rates in many of your schedules. Do you really believe it unconstitutional to protect American workmen by design but perfectly all right if you do it without intending it?

You are intending to kill off monopolies; to raise the necessary revenues, by lowering the tariff as nearly as possible to a free-trade basis, and claiming that you will not hurt our industries. Well, then, if you reduce the tariff one-half, double the quantity of goods must be imported to raise the same revenue; and if they come in, somebody in America will be hunting another job and Democratic Congressmen will be in the searching party. And if, as you claim, the effect will be not to close American factories, but that they will continue to supply our markets, then goods can not come in in greater quantity than at present; and with your lowered rates what becomes of your revenues?

Upon either horn of the dilemma you will be impaled. If your low tariff lets in a flood of foreign goods, you drive American workmen out of employment. If the flood does not come, your revenue will fail. Let the American workman hunt another job; let him go back to the farm, you say. The puddler, the machinist, the spinner, and the weaver are no more fitted to go back to the farm than my friend BURKE here or MURDOCK over there would be fit to do a day's work in the harvest field.

It is all very well to talk about our market lying beyond the seas, but the greatest market in the world is our American market. Our first duty is to hold to it. You can not do that if you throw open our doors to foreign competition.

If you can pay the American scale of wages and still capture a foreign market, go to it, but we have a cinch on a market that is worth all the European markets put together, and our first duty is to hold to it.

Every foreign workman making goods for American consumption that could be made here throws an American workman out of a job.

Your bill will transfer a large part of our spinning industry to England. Great reductions in the tariff on woolens will eventually and inevitably transfer to French, German, and English weavers part of the work done now by Americans.

Your bill will transfer the plate-glass industry to Belgium.

You strike the farmer at every step, the manufacturer and the workingman indiscriminately, not intentionally but none the less disastrously.

A large part of our revenues is habitually raised by a tariff whatever party is in power. This involves careful study of the rates necessary to be laid, whether they be laid for the simple purpose of revenue under a "tariff for revenue only" or under a tariff under the "protective" scheme.

The latter policy, to which the Progressive Party adheres, requires that the tariff should be taken out of partisan politics and the facts carefully ascertained by a nonpartisan commission and rates levied that will be just high enough to preserve the difference between the American and foreign scales of wages, plus a fair profit to the American manufacturer on all goods that can be produced in this country.

Your bill has been prepared in the same old way. Prepared by a few in secret and forced through a caucus with haste utterly incompatible with intelligent consideration, you have simply taken a leap in the dark. I admire the skill of the select handful in steering through a Democratic caucus a bill which in its entirety commands the entire and sincere approval of few Democrats here and at home.

I make these criticisms in no partisan spirit.

I read the inaugural address of President Wilson, and I regard it as one of the greatest state papers published since Lincoln's time. It was of necessity general in its terms, but as a Progressive of 30 years' standing that message was progressive enough for me, and if President Wilson can unite the warring, clashing elements of his party in a sincere and harmonious adherence to the general sentiments he uttered on that occasion and hammer those sentiments into concrete expression in the statute books, and if he can demonstrate that his tariff views are correct, the Democratic Party will be in the saddle for the next 20 years. But there was one false note in that message, and it was Mr. Wilson's views upon the tariff. The people of this country are not with him on the tariff.

On his progressive policies the Progressive Party will support him. They can not follow him on the tariff. We stand in this Congress few in numbers, but backed by 4,000,000 of voters, and we are pledged to support every genuine progressive doctrine whatever may be its label.

Progressives are sneered at in this Hall, on both sides of this House, revealing the reactionary elements here, but progressivism has become popular, so popular that there is a race now with the old party leaders to get their bills in first to show the voters how progressive they are; but, irrespective of the author, the Progressives will support every real progressive measure presented, whether by Democrats or Republicans.

There is an element in the Democratic Party that is hostile to Mr. Wilson's progressive views; there are the same irreconcilable elements in the Democratic Party that divided the Republican Party. A majority of the American people are opposed to the Democratic doctrines of the tariff.

A powerful element in the Democratic Party is standpat and reactionary and at heart opposed to every progressive doctrine.

On these rocks the Democratic bark will go to pieces.

The Democratic assault upon the productive industries of the country and the lack of Democratic cohesion to the progressive doctrines will result in the filling of these benches with Progressives at the next election.

So far as this bill is concerned, it is not the manner nor methods nor influences that were invoked that is the real issue, but it is the bill itself, and it is its effects upon the people and their industries for which the Democratic Party must be responsible.

There are sections of this bill for which I would like to vote. I would vote for the income tax; and there are many other sections to which I could give my hearty approval, but the bill is presented with intentional adroitness, perhaps, by those who intend to force it through, so that it must be voted for in toto, and under such circumstances I am impelled to dissent, for I believe the bill to be a perilous assault in many of its parts upon the industries of the country, far exceeding in injury any good there may be in it.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution of the following title:

H. J. Res. 62. Joint resolution making an appropriation for defraying the expenses of the Committees of the Senate and House of Representatives authorized to attend and represent the Senate and House at the unveiling and dedication of the memorial to Thomas Jefferson at St. Louis, Mo.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Senate concurrent resolution 1.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 6,000 additional copies of House Report No. 1593, Sixty second Congress, on the Concentration of Control of Money and Credit, of which 2,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate document room and 4,000 copies for the use of the House document room.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. PAGE and Mr. LANE members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments," for the disposition of useless papers in the Department of the Interior.

THE TARIFF.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I trust I shall not be guilty of presumption, as one of the new Members of this House, in attempting here to express my sentiments upon the legislation now under consideration. For while I have no hope of influencing the minds of those who see fit to differ from us, it is proper, and, indeed, expected, that we shall give to the American people the reasons for the faith which we proclaim.

It is futile to seek to harmonize the differences between the Democratic and Republican Parties upon the subject of tariff taxation. Those differences are fundamental. The conflict which has for many years been waged between them upon this subject is as irrepressible now as when the difference was first emphasized by the respective followers of Hamilton and Jefferson. It is not a conflict merely between two theories as such. It is not a dogmatic clinging to a fetich on the one hand, or a fine-spun, visionary policy upon the other. It is, and has always been, a clear-cut fight between right and wrong, between justice and injustice, between the rights of the people and the demands of their despoilers.

The Democratic Party proceeds now, and has always proceeded, upon the doctrine upon which our political founder planted his faith, "Equal rights to all, and special privileges to none." [Applause on the Democratic side.] While the Republican Party proceeds now, and has always proceeded, upon the antithetical doctrine of "special privileges to some, and equal rights to none." Such a course as has been consistently followed by our opponents was destined to inevitable disaster, as they themselves can now abundantly admit.

But, Mr. Chairman, we are to-day facing a condition, not an unexplored theory. We are facing a condition which abundantly justifies the action we shall take at this session of Congress, and a condition which is the culmination of a remarkable series of historical events. In the beginning let us not lose sight of the fact that the tariff, so mythical and nebulous to the average man, is nothing more nor less than a tax. The only fundamental difference between it and other forms of taxation is that it is collected indirectly, while other forms of taxes are collected directly from the taxpayer. But stripping it of its technical import, we find the tariff a vehicle of extraction whereby the people are caused to let go something that is theirs through the agencies of government.

All taxation, in theory at least, not only National but State, county, and municipal, is based upon the needs of the government. The government, so-called, being the mere agency through which the people transact the business of the people, it must therefore follow, as the night the day, that the people's agents have no legal nor moral right to collect from the people more than is necessary to carry on the people's business with intelligence and economy. I take it that no political economist, of whatever school, will deny this principle. It therefore follows that those who are charged with the conduct of the people's business must first ascertain the needs of the government in the matter of revenues, and lay their taxes according to those needs. This is true, whether the taxation be direct or indirect. This is the principle upon which the Democratic Party is now proceeding and upon which it has proceeded in the past.

But our adversaries, both the Republicans and the so-called Progressives, who are a mere branch shot out from the trunk of Republicanism, have always proceeded and are now proceeding upon the contrary idea, that you must find out how much protection the favored few demand and then regulate your revenues and expenditures in accordance with that demand. In other words, that the primary object of taxation is not to raise revenues for the expenses of the Government, but that the primary object of taxation is to protect a few people at the expense of the many; and if the Government in this adventure obtains money in its Treasury some method of expenditure will be discovered which will not only dissipate it but furnish an excuse for additional taxation upon the same theory.

Before I proceed further, permit me to call attention to a proposition which has been urged here on this floor by our Progressive friends. They seem to have adopted as the cardinal plank in their platform the proposal to regulate the tariff by means of a so-called tariff commission, stating that neither the Democrats nor the Republicans know anything about a just and equitable tariff. In so far as they claim that the Republicans know nothing about it, I heartily concur. I think the Progressives are experts on the subject of Republicanism, having recently themselves departed from that fold.

I take it for granted they are correct when they say the Republicans can not scientifically revise the tariff, but I must respectfully dissent from their claim that the Democrats can not scientifically or properly revise the tariff, because, in my opinion the bill now under consideration successfully refutes that statement. But I desire to inquire of our Progressive friends, so called, if neither the Republican nor the Democratic Party can revise the tariff intelligently or scientifically, how can the Progressive Party, which has neither pride of ancestry nor hope of posterity, in the face of a hundred years of tariff agitation and legislation, claim to be able to revise it scientifically merely by the appointment of a Tariff Commission, which will be no more scientific than the members of the Ways and Means Committee on either side of this House? [Applause on the Democratic side.] Another thing I should like to ask our Progressive friends: When did the American people by any constitutional enactment or by their consent ever agree to delegate to any commission, large or small, the power of legislation, and especially the power of legislation in the matter of taxation? That power is granted solely to the Congress by the Constitution, and that power can not be delegated by Congress to any body outside of Congress, and the people would not consent for it to be so delegated. There is no more important question that confronts the American people to-day than the question of taxation, for the power to tax carries with it the power to destroy and the power to confiscate, and the American people have never yet, and, in my opinion, never will agree that a commission of experts, so called, shall have the power to tax them and take from their pockets that which is theirs even for the support of the National Government.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota and Mr. HULINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I regret I can not do so, because I have only a few minutes. If I have time enough when I conclude my remarks, I shall be glad to yield to the gentlemen.

As was so well said by the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. UNDERWOOD] in his opening remarks upon the pending bill, prior to the Civil War the Government of the United States and the people thereof, including manufacturers of every kind, had prospered under a system of comparatively low tariffs.

Even those who timidly advocated the doctrine of protection for its own sake only sought to apply it to the infant industries, in order to enable them to get upon their feet and flourish without protection. But when the great Civil War came on, and methods of raising enormous sums as revenue were to be devised, the tariff on imports was vastly increased—not even then as protection to the manufacturer, but purely and simply as war measures, because even the Republican Party at that time would not have dared to raise the taxes except they could justify their conduct by the exigencies of war. After the war was over, and the blood of North and South had been spilled upon every battle field, the cry then went up that the Government is enormously in debt as a result of the war, and that the taxes can not be reduced. At the same time the manufacturers, always seeking bounties, always asking to be placed upon stilts built by the Government, having been permitted to taste the sweets of high protection joined hands with the Republican Party, and from then until now have fastened upon the people this unjust and iniquitous system of taxation. Notwithstanding the war has been over for more than half a century, the Republican Party has gradually and stealthily increased the burdens of taxation to the extent that the American people are demanding relief, and in their search for the agency through which that relief shall be vouchsafed to them have turned to the Democratic Party, which has always been the political refuge of the weary and heavy laden.

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the gentleman permit an interruption and answer a question?

Mr. BARKLEY. If the gentleman will wait until I conclude my remarks, I shall be glad to yield.

But it is useless, Mr. Chairman, to ruminate among the dusty archives of ancient Republican history. The more recent history of the Republican Party, as enacted by the modern combination of politico-commercial statesmen of that party, furnishes us ample food for reflection and consolation. But before I go into that I desire to call attention to the result of the tariff legislation to which I have just called your attention.

In addition to laying and collecting heavy and unnecessary taxes upon the people, not for their own good, but for the protection of a favored class who have satiated their bounty-loving appetites in the vitals of the people, the Republican Party has fostered, encouraged, and built up a system of combinations and aggregations of wealth such as the world never dreamed of before. Great monopolies, winked at by the Republican Party, have sprung up like mushrooms overnight, and through their ability as favored, petted, pampered interests, have extracted unjustly from the American people millions upon millions of money which never reached the vaults of the Treasury and never was intended to reach them. Not only this, but through the unholy alliance between crooked business and crooked politics, we have not only been robbed of our money, but have been robbed of many of our political ideals of governmental justice and purity. We have seen these giant aggregations of wealth, made fat and sleek at the people's expense, sweep down upon the Congress of the United States demanding not only that they be permitted to dictate the people's laws, but shall name the people's officers. We have seen them in the corridors of State legislatures dictating the election of United States Senators sent here, not to represent the great masses of the people, but to represent the special, bounty-loving, favor-seeking unspeakably selfish interests which sent them here. We have, under this system, seen the rights of the people trampled under foot. We have seen profits increase to fabulous proportions upon watered stock. We have seen the cost of living rise gradually under this system until it is with difficulty that the professional man or the skilled laborer is able to accommodate his needs to his earnings, to say nothing of the vast numbers of unskilled laborers throughout the vast extent of our country. And all this, under the Republican Party, in the interest of labor and infant industries.

They tell us that protection is necessary. Necessary for what? At first they told us it was necessary in order to encourage our infant industries, but they did not cease, but increased protection, after the industries ceased to be infants and became giants. They then told us protection was necessary in order to help the laboring man. But we have seen the cost of living increase under this system almost 50 per cent in the last decade, while the increase in wages of laboring men has been much less than 20 per cent.

Yet the Republicans have not diminished their protection nor folded their generously protecting arms. Then driven into the corner on both these propositions as to infant industries and labor, they now assume a new position, namely, that the protective theory ought so to be adjusted as to equalize the cost of production at home and abroad, with a fair profit to the manufacturer. Yet no Republican has yet been able to fix a standard of wages abroad which should be adopted, because of the fact that in one country of the Old World wages are at one figure, and in another country at another, and still another somewhere else. So that no just standard can be fixed as a basis upon which to act that would not give either too much protection or too little protection, according to the Republican doctrine. So that inevitably the Republican Party is driven from one extreme to another, and driven from pillar to post in its effort to justify before the American people their unfair, selfish, corrupt, unwise, and unpatriotic methods of taxation which bears largely upon the problem of the distribution of our wealth.

These conditions had grown so intolerable among the people that in 1908 even the moss-backed and fossilized Republican Party was forced to adopt a platform declaring for a "revision" of the tariff. The people had begun more forcibly than ever to realize that a tariff is a tax, and that a protective tariff is a special tax against the masses for the benefit of a few. Therefore the people demanded relief, not only from the taxes themselves but from the condition brought about by this system which enabled a few men to control the markets of the country, fixing the price of that which the people had to sell as well as what they had to buy. So the Republican Party, realizing its danger, realizing the fact that the American people are constantly becoming more intelligent and discriminating, and realizing that whilst they had been able to "fool some of the people all the time and all the people some of the time" they could not longer fool all the people all of the time. Thus they in their platform in 1908 promised to "revise" the tariff. But the people were suspicious of this promise and asked whether the Republican Party proposed to "revise" the tariff upward, as it had always done before, or whether they proposed to revise it downward, as the people demanded.

You will remember that Mr. Taft, who was a candidate for President upon that platform, realizing the predicament in which the party found itself, in his speeches constantly stated that the kind of a revision the Republicans meant was a revision downward in behalf of the consuming masses. The people took him and his party at their word—which they have never done except to their sorrow. They elected Mr. Taft President upon the faith of the promise which he made to them. After he was inaugurated, he called the Congress in extra session to revise the tariff downward, ostensibly. After spending many months here a bill was perpetrated on the American people called the Payne-Aldrich law—very properly named, in view of its effect upon the people—which was discovered to be a revision of the tariff upward instead of downward. The rest of the story is familiar to us all. Of what avail will it be to recount broken promises, numberless as the sands of the sea? Of what avail to bring fresh before this Congress and before the people their shameless betrayal by the last Republican administration? What shall we accomplish merely by recounting the failure of one set of men to do their duty unless we shall follow that recital with the accomplishment of our own mission as Members of this body?

What, therefore, Mr. Chairman, is our mission to-day as Members of the Congress of the United States? What commission do we hold from the people, and how shall that commission be executed? Certainly no Democrat can maintain that he holds any commission here to protect the favored classes to the detriment of the unfavored masses. Certainly no Democrat can maintain that he is here to continue longer the blighting system of graft and greed fastened upon us by the Republican Party. Certainly no Democrat can maintain that he is here to assist in the further looting of the people, even though it be possible to accomplish the act without the knowledge of the victim. Certainly no Democrat can maintain that the present artificial and medicated commercial and economic and industrial status of the United States should be longer maintained. Certainly no Democrat can maintain that the handicaps which have restricted our commercial supremacy in the past should be longer permitted to endure. And certainly no Democrat can maintain that this Government is obligated, legally or morally, to guarantee the protection of the hothouse to industrial enterprises if they can not stand in the fresh air of free and open competition.

Realizing, therefore, that we are here to carry into effect the mandate of the people we have offered to this House and to the country the Underwood bill, now under consideration. Seeking, therefore, to keep unbroken our pledges to the American people we are offering to them something the Republican Party has never given nor offered—an honest tariff law. A tariff based upon the competitive principle. A tariff which will appeal to the great masses of our people as fair and just, despite the howling and squealing of those who are incidentally pushed from the public trough, whose benefits they have monopolized and squandered for half a century. We are offering a tariff which seeks not to destroy any legitimate industry, but seeks to inoculate into all lawful industry the germs of a healthy life. We seek to substitute the real for the artificial. We seek to replace fundamental falsity with eternal truth. We seek to convince the American people that they can conquer by the sheer force of their superior ability, of their inventive genius, of their wonderfully resourceful activities, without applying the artificial stimulants thought necessary to revive an ebbing life. We are seeking by this law to wipe out favoritism and to legislate for the whole people. We are seeking to divorce big business from big politics, and make it unnecessary for the great commercial fabric of this Nation to depend upon the bounty and favoritism of the people's Government in order to succeed. We are seeking to subvent the socialistic tendencies of the times, which are the direct result of the maintenance of Republican policies. For the ultimate conclusion of republicanism is socialism. For if it be true that the Government, as such, owes it to a favored class to protect them in their commercial enterprises, in order that profits may be vouchsafed to them, why not go one step further and declare that the Government, as such, owes it to all the people to not only protect, but actually to conduct all commercial enterprises in order that something of profit may be vouchsafed to all the people? One doctrine is as tenable as the other. Both are founded in falsehood. Both are contrary to the theory upon which all free governments are founded. Both are founded upon the false notion that the Government owes everything to the people, or a favored few of them, and that the people owe nothing to the Government.

But if it be denied that Republicanism leads inevitably to socialism, it can not truthfully be denied that Republicanism, with its selfish, un-American, and mendacious favoritism, has been largely responsible for the growth of socialism. You can not unjustly hoist one class of our people without unjustly lowering the other. You can not, by Government aid, create enormous wealth without creating unwholesome want. Recognizing these fundamental truths we are proceeding upon the only sound and honorable course by proposing to hoist no man at the expense of his neighbor. We are proposing a tariff bill which refuses to recognize the protective theory as worthy of any place in the political thought of a free people. We are proceeding upon the time-honored Democratic doctrine that all taxes of every description and from whatever source collected shall be for revenue only, a doctrine which has brought the Democratic Party safely through the tempestuous waters of more than a hundred years of strife and turmoil into a welcome and a tranquil harbor.

We have heard much from our Republican calamity howlers about destruction and ruin to business on account of this tariff. This "stop-thief" cry has been heard so often in this country that it will no longer alarm sensible people. It is but the wail of the political and commercial coward. It is an effort to frighten honest and legitimate business into the belief that the Republican Party is the reservoir of all their prosperity, and the advent of Democracy the harbinger of shrinking profits and soup houses. Such an argument can emanate only from a dishonest mind. It is but an effort to carry out the long-established policy of the Republican Party in fooling the American people. But, thanks to the intelligence and wisdom of the people, this cry of fear will find no response in the hearts of the people. I have heard so much during this debate of the crumbling of industries, of smokeless stacks, and dollarless banks, that I am convinced that unless the Nation goes out of business the Republican Party, what little of it remains, will be sorely disappointed. For it is fear upon which that party has fed by day and falsehood upon which it pillowed its head by night. And realizing now that the people have repudiated it for its sins, it seeks again to raise its prostrate form through fear and falsehood, unwilling to profit by its own mistakes or to be purged in the crucible of public opinion.
